He was the author of: 1. 'De Mathematicis Disciplinis lib. XII, in quibus earum utilitas, dignitas, natura, divisio explicantur,' Antwerp, 1635, fol. (dedicated to Philip IV, king of Spain). 2. 'Experientia Mathematica, de compositione numerorum, linearum, quadratorum, &c.,' Madrid, 1642, 8vo. 3. 'Dictionarium Mathematicum,' which was prepared for the press but never published.

The following manuscripts by him are preserved in the National Library at Madrid: 'Historia de regimine Philippi IV' (G. 78); 'Parecer sobre el riago de los prados de Aranjuez y lugares vecinos, en tiempo de Felipe IV'; 'Parecer sobre las señales que se vieron en el cielo, año 1637' (S. 104); 'Discurso contra los ministros codiciosos.'

[Catholic Miscellany, ix. 40; De Backer's Bibl. de la Compagnia de Jesús (1876), ii. 755; Foley's Records; vii. 697; Leitch's Narratives of Scottish Catholics, p. 372; Oliver's Jesuit Collections, p. 37; Southwell's Bibl. Script. Soc. Jesu, p. 354; Stother's Catholic Mission in Scotland, p. 611.] T. C.

SEMPILL, SIR JAMES (1566-1625) of Beltraes, called by Knox 'the dancer,' was eldest son of John Sempill (son of Robert, third lord Sempill [q. v.] His mother, Mary Livingstone, is described by Knox as 'the lusty' daughter of Alexander, fifth lord Livingstone, and one of the 'four Marys' of Mary Queen of Scots. Both John Sempill and Mary were special favourites of the queen, from whom they received on 9 May 1564-5 the lands of Auchtermuchty in Fifeshire, and various lands in Ayrshire. In 1577 doom of forfeiture was pronounced against John Sempill for his part in a conspiracy to assassinate the regent Morton. The conspiracy was revealed by Gilbert Sempill, his associate, and John Sempill made confession and was sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, but was reprieved and sentenced to be imprisoned in Edinburgh during the regent's pleasure. He died soon after obtaining his liberty, 25 April 1579.

The son was born in 1566, and, being about the same age as the young prince (afterwards James VI), he was, to use his own quaint language regarding the circumstances of his upbringing, 'devoted to his [the prince's] service' by his parents before he 'was'; 'thereafter named in, and after his majesty's own name, before himself could know it; yet after knowledge, confirmed, in his H. court, almost ever since nursed and schooled.' 'And so,' he continues, 'is our David, the king of my birth, the master of my service, the father of my name, framer of my nature, and the Gamaliel of my education, at whose feet (no, at whose elbow and from whose mouth) I confess I have sucked the best of whatsoever may be thought good in me' ('Sacrelega Sacredly Handled,' quoted in PATERSON'S Sempills of Beltrees, p. xxiv). After a course of instruction with the young king, under the direction of George Buchanan, he completed his education at the university of St. Andrews.

Sempill assisted James VI in preparing for the press his 'Basilicon Doron,' 1599; and of the seven copies, all privately printed, one was presented to him. This he privately showed to Andrew Melville, who, having taken note of certain statements on ecclesiastical policy, communicated them to his nephew, James Melville, which led to the matter being brought before the synod of Fife, much to the king's indignation [see under MELVILLE, ANDREW, 1545-1622]. When Andrew Melville was in 1606 committed to the Tower of London, Sempill did his utmost to befriend him and secure his liberation.

In 1599 Sempill was resident in London as 'agent' in the affairs of the king of Scots, and in February 1599-1600 he received a passport from Elizabeth to return to Scotland (cf. PATERSON'S Sempills of Beltrees, pp. xxx-xxxi). Shortly after his return he was made knight-bachelor, and in 1601 he was sent on an embassy to France. In February 1602-3 the king, in token of the good service done by him both at home and abroad, 'granted and disposed to him, his heirs and assignees,' a jewel of great beauty and value, formerly belonging to the king's mother, with full power to 'sue all persons who have the said jewel in their keeping for delivery thereof to him;' and 'with command to the advocate to assist in the delivery to him of the jewel, or the value thereof' (Reg. P. C. Scotl. vi. 531). When King James visited Paisley in 1617, Sempill prepared an oration which 'a pretty boy of nine years' delivered before him in the hall of the Earl of Abercorn.

Sempill died at his house at the Cross of Paisley in February 1625-6, and is described in the obituaries of Robert Boyd of Trochrig as a 'grand ennemie à la pseudo-hierarchie.' By his wife, Egidia, daughter of Elphinstone of Blythswood, he had two sons, Robert [see below] and George, the latter of whom died young, and five daughters, of whom Marion was married to Colin Campbell of Ardkinlas, and Margaret to Walter Macfarlane of Macfarlane.

Sempill was the author of several controversial works displaying some learning and no small dialectic skill: 1. 'Cassandra Scotticana to Cassander Anglicanus,' Middelburg, 1618. 2. 'Sacrelega sacredly handled, that is, according to Scripture only; for the use of all Churches in general, but more especially for those of North Britaine,' London, 1619 (against Scaliger and Selden). 3. 'Scoti rovi ruxóvros Paraclesis contra Danielis Tileni Silesii Paranesin, cuius pars prima est de Episcopali Ecclesiæ Regimine,' 1622; written at the suggestion of Andrew Melville, and with his help, against a work of Tilenus, a late colleague of Melville's at Sedan, entitled 'Paranesis ad Scotos, Genevensis Disciplinæ Zelotas,' London, 1620. He also continued the poetic tradition of the Sempills by producing the 'Packman's Pater Noster,' a clever satirical attack, but outrageously partisan in tone, against the church of Rome; an edition published at Edinburgh in 1669 bore the title, 'A Pick-Tooth for the Pope, or the Packman's Pater Noster set down in a Dialogue betwixt a Packman and a Priest;' translated out of Dutch by S. I. S. and newly augmented and enlarged by his son, R. S.

The son, ROBERT SEMPILL (1596?-1666?), who was born probably about 1596, and educated at the university of Glasgow, where he matriculated in March 1613, enlarged his father's satire, 'The Packman's Pater Noster,' and won for himself a place of his own among Scottish poets by his famous elegy on 'The Life and Death of Habbie Simson, Piper of Kilbarchan.' The intrinsic merits of the piece, as well as its graphically humorous picture of the amusements of the olden time, would alone entitle its author to a high place among Scottish poets, but it is specially notable besides for its stave, a revival of an ancient one which had passed into desuetude. Through the popularity of the poem the stave became the standard one for Scots elegiac verse long before Burns gave it his special imprimatur. The elegy is supposed to date from about 1640, and had achieved wide popularity as a broadside before it was included in Watson's 'Choice Collection,' 1706-1709. Sempill is also credited with the authorship of the epitaph on 'Sawny Briggs, nephew to Habbie Simson and brother to the Laird of Kilbarchan,' in the same stanza; and he no doubt was the author of other poems—it may even be of some attributed to his son Francis [q.v.]. Robert Sempill died between 1660 and 1669. By his wife, Marie Lyon, daughter of Lyon of Auldbar, he had a son Francis, and a daughter Elizabeth, married to Sir George Maxwell of New Wark.

[James Melville's Diary in the Wodrow Society; McOrie's Life of Andrew Melville; Reg. P. C. Scotl. vol. vi.; Calderwood's Hist. of the Kirk of Scotland; Paterson's Poems of the Sempills of Beltnes, 1849.] T. F. H.

SEMPILL or SEMPLE, ROBERT, third LORD SEMPILL (d. 1572), commonly called the great Lord Sempill, was the elder son of William, second lord Sempill, by his first wife, Lady Margaret Montgomery, eldest daughter of Hugh, first earl of Eglinton. The family from the thirteenth century were heritable bailiffs of the regality of Paisley, and sheriffs of Renfrewshire, under the lord high steward of Scotland. They frequently distinguished themselves in the English wars, and were employed in important duties of state. Sir Thomas Sempill, father of John, first lord Sempill, was killed at the battle of Sanchieburn on 11 June 1488, fighting in support of James III, and the first lord (created by James IV about 1489), fell at Flodden on 9 Sept. 1513.

The third lord, while master of Sempill, obtained, on 20 Oct. 1533, a charter of the office of governor and constable of the king's castle of Douglas. He succeeded his father in 1548. Being a steadfast supporter of the queen regent against the lords of the congregation, he is described by Knox as 'a man sold under sin, an enemy to God and to all godliness' (Works, i. p. 389). On account of an attack he had made on Arran, the lords of the west resolved to take his house of Castle Sempill, and laid siege to it in December 1559 (Cal. State Papers, For. 1559-60, No. 396). Leaving his son at Castle Sempill, he took refuge in the stronghold of Dunbar, then under the command of a French captain, M. Sarlabois. The latter was in August 1560 asked to give him up (ib. 1560-1, No. 428), but declined to do so until he received the command of the king and queen (ib. No. 588). Randolph shortly afterwards reported that Sempill had conveyed himself secretly out (ib. No. 550), then that he had retired to his own castle with twenty arquebusiers lent him by Sarlabois (ib. No. 571), and, finally, that he had gone to France (ib. No. 661); but when his castle was taken in November (ib. No. 717), he was still at Dunbar. He was 'relaxed from the horn' in March 1561 (ib. 1561-2, No. 15).

Sempill was one of the 'nobles and barons of the west country' who on 5 Sept. signed a band in support of Mary and Darnley, in opposition to the Earl of Moray and other rebels (Reg. P. C. Scotl. i. 303), and in the army raised against them held a command in the vanguard of the battle (ib. p. 379); but though a catholic, he, after the murder of Darnley, joined the association for the 'defences of the young prince' in opposition to Bothwell and the queen. At Carberry Hill on 14 June 1567 he commanded in the vanguard of the army which opposed the queen; and he was also one of those who signed the documents authorising William Douglas of Lochleven to take the queen under his charge in his fortalice of Lochleven. In Morton's declaration regarding the discovery and custody of the 'casket letters,' he is mentioned as having been present at the opening of the casket. After the queen's escape from Lochleven he assembled his dependents against her at Langside on 13 May 1568; and on the 19th he was, with the Earl of Glencairn, appointed lieutenant of the western parts, with special instructions to watch the castle of Dumbarton, and prevent the entrance into it of provisions or reinforcements or fugitives (ib. i. 614-15). For his special services he obtained a gift of the abbey of Paisley. Notwithstanding the utmost efforts of Glencairn and Sempill, the castle of Dumbarton continued to hold out, until, on 1 April 1571, its rock was scaled by Thomas Crawford [q.v.] of Jordanhill. Previous to this Sempill, while returning one evening in May 1570 from the army which had demolished the castle of the Hamiltons, was seized by some of the Hamiltons' dependents, and carried a prisoner to Draffen, whence he was shortly afterwards removed to Argyre (Cal. State Papers, For. 1569-71, No. 962; CALDERWOOD, History, ii. 565). Calderwood states that he remained in Argyre for twelve months, but he was probably set at liberty in February 1570; for when the house of Paisley surrendered to the regent at that time, the lives of those within it were granted on this condition (Cal. State Papers, For. 1569-71, No. 1570).

On 12 June 1572 he had a charter of the lands of Glassford, and he appears to have died in the autumn of the same year. By his first wife, Isabel, daughter of Sir William Hamilton of Sanguhar, he had, with four daughters, two sons—Robert, who predeceased him, leaving a son Robert, fourth lord Sempill, and Andrew, ancestor of the Sempills of Burchell. By his second wife, Elizabeth Carlyle, of the house of Thorthorwald, he had a son John, ancestor of the Sempills of Beltrees [see under SEMPILL, SIR JAMES]. The fourth lord Sempill was in 1607 excommunicated by the kirk as 'a confirmed and obstinate papist,' and appears to have died in 1611.

Neither the third lord Sempill nor his son Robert, master of Sempill, nor the fourth lord Sempill could have been (as Sibbald, Motherwell, and others maintain) the Robert Sempill who was author of the 'Sempill Ballads' [see SEMPILL, ROBERT, 1530?-1595]; the fourth lord was born too late, while in the case of the first two the early date of their death precludes the supposition.

[Cal. State Papers, For. Ser. reign of Elizabeth, and also Scot. Ser. Reg. P. C. Scotl. vols. i.-ii.; Histories of Knox and Calderwood; Douglas's Scottish Peerage (Wood), ii. 493-4; Collections for the County of Renfrew, vol. ii. 1890.]
T. F. H.

SEMPILL, ROBERT (1530?-1595), ballad-writer on the side of the reformers, born about 1530, was doubtless a cadet of the house of Sempill, of illegitimate birth. Sibbald, Motherwell, and others vainly sought to identify him with Robert, fourth lord Sempill, who succeeded his grandfather in 1572 and died in 1611 [see under SEMPILL or SEMPILN, ROBERT, third lord SEMPILL]. The ballad-writer received a liberal education. A part of his early life was spent in Paris. In one of his poems he speaks of Clement Marot, who died in 1544, as alive. On his return to Scotland he probably adopted the military profession. Three humorous poems of his of a licentious character that have been preserved in George Bannatyne's manuscript in the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh, may be referred to a date anterior to 1567, in which year Sempill is known to have written political pasquils. That he held some position at court, or had rendered some political service at this time, is proved by an entry in the lord-treasurer's books of 66*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* paid 'to Robert Sempill.' According to his poem entitled 'Ane Complaint upon Fortoun,' he was present at the siege of Leith in 1559-60. In 1570 he issued from the press of Lekprevik in a broadside 'The Regentis Tragedie,' which enjoyed much popularity. During the next two years he wrote a number of pieces of great bitterness, chiefly directed against the Hamiltons, Sir William Kirkcaldy, Sir William Maitland, and others who adhered to the cause of Mary or favoured the catholic faith. In 1572 he was once more in Paris, whence he fled at the massacres of St. Bartholomew. In 1573 he was in Edinburgh, and was probably with the army of Morton during the memorable siege of the castle. In that year he published, in a small quarto volume in black letter—the only known extant copy is in the British Museum—a graphic account of the bombardment of the fortress and the surrender of Grange and Lethington. This poem contains the names of many of the officers of the attacking force, of whom no record has elsewhere been preserved.

Besides 'Ane Complaint upon Fortoun,' written in 1581, in which he feelingly laments the downfall of Morton, Sempill wrote in 1584 a merciless but clever pasquinade, entitled 'The Legend of the Bishop of St. Androis Lyfe,' in which he held up to ridicule Patrick Adamson [q. v.] Dempster places Sempill's death in 1595.

In his ballads, which enjoyed a very great popularity, Sempill appears as a staunch supporter of Moray and the party of the Reformation. His satires are crude and often coarse, but vigorous. As records they are eminently trustworthy, and have a lasting value. Most of the ballads have come down to us in black-letter broadsides, which are preserved in the state paper office, the British Museum, and the library of the Society of Antiquaries, London. Two manuscripts of 'The Legend of the Bishop of St. Androis Lyfe' are extant, one in the library of the university of Edinburgh, the other in that of the Faculty of Advocates.

The three poems in the Bannatyne manuscript were first printed by Allan Ramsay in the 'Evergreen,' Edinburgh, 1724. The 'Siege of the Castel of Edinburgh' and 'The Legend of the Bishop of St. Androis Lyfe' were included by Sir John Graham Dalyell in 'Scottish Poems of the Sixteenth Century,' Edinburgh, 1801, 2 vols. The whole of Sempill's pieces are contained in 'The Sempill Ballates,' edited by T. G. Stevenson, Edinburgh, 1872, and in 'Satirical Poems of the Time of the Reformation,' edited for the Scottish Text Society by James Cranstoun, LL.D., Edinburgh, 1889-93, 2 vols. 8vo.

[The editions of Sempill's ballads, cited above.]
J. C.-N.

SEMPILL or SEMPLE, WILLIAM (1546-1633), soldier of fortune and political agent, born in 1546, was a cadet of the noble family of Sempill long seated in Renfrewshire. His exact place in the family tree has been variously stated. His name does not occur in Douglas's 'Peerage.' Conn calls him 'frater baronis,' which he certainly was not. Other contemporary writers make him the bastard son of the third or uncle of the fourth baron (COLVILLE, Letters, ed. D. Laing, p. 329). Father Hugh Sempill [q. v.], who was undoubtedly his brother's son, describes himself as 'Craigbaitaus,' the Sempills of Craigbait or Craigbet being a branch of the family descended from David, a younger brother of the third, or the 'great' lord Sempill.

In his youth Sempill was for some time attached to the court of Mary Stuart. He subsequently joined a Scottish regiment under Colonel William Stewart, in the service of the Prince of Orange, and on 25 March 1582 he took the command of a company of Scots in the strongly fortified garrison of Liere, near Antwerp. Here, according to one account, smarting under injuries from Colonel Stewart, and under insults which he had received from the governor of the town, who had threatened to hang him for complaining of the sufferings of the Scottish soldiers (for they had been ten weeks without pay or food, and were compelled to live upon roots), Captain Sempill in revenge resolved to betray the garrison into the hands of the Prince of Parma (W. Herle to Burghley, Hatfield MSS. ii. 511). According to the Jesuit historian Strada, Sempill obtained a secret interview with Parma at Poperinghe, and declared to him that he had purchased his captaincy at Liere only in order to deliver up the place to the Spaniards, and that if he should succeed in this he should ask for no other reward than his own satisfaction in the event. Parma accordingly placed Sempill in communication with Matthew Corvino, an old and experienced soldier, with whom the plan was arranged. On the night of 1 Aug. 1582 Sempill obtained permission on some pretext to make a sortie, and was given thirty Scots and seven States soldiers for the purpose. He then effected a junction with the troops of Corvino, and early in the morning of the 2nd returned to Liere, where by a preconcerted arrangement with his brother, who was serving as a lieutenant in the same garrison, the gates were opened, and after a brief struggle, during which Sempill distinguished himself by slaying the gatekeeper and officer of the watch, the Dutch forces were overpowered and the Spaniards took possession of the town. The moral effects of Sempill's action were considerable, for though Liere was not a large place, it was, on account of its strength and position, regarded as 'the bulwark of Antwerp and the key of Brabant,' and the betrayal of Bruges in the following year by Colonel Boyd was probably prompted by his countryman's example. After a short visit to Parma at Namur, Sempill was now (1582) sent into Spain with a strong recommendation to the king, who, says Strada, handsomely rewarded him. In November 1587 Philip despatched him to Bernardino de Mendoza then at Paris, warning the ambassador to be cautious in dealing with him, as, in spite of his apparent zeal, he was nevertheless 'very Scotch.' Mendoza, however, was able to report to the king that he found Sempill more trustworthy than most Scotsmen of either sword or gown, and the colonel (as he was now called) was in consequence busily employed in the secret negotiations then being carried on with the catholic nobles of Scotland in view of the projected invasion of England. It was supposed by George Conn [q. v.] that Sempill was also entrusted with a mission to James himself, in the hope of bringing about a marriage of the Scottish king with the infanta of Spain.

Sempill landed at Leith early in August 1588, when he was immediately apprehended by Sir John Carmichael by the king's order. The Earl of Huntly contrived to release him, but James had him again captured and imprisoned in Edinburgh. Once more, by an expenditure of four hundred crowns on the part of Robert Bruce (if this spy and conspirator is to be trusted) and with the aid of Huntly and Lady Ross, a daughter of Lord Sempill, the colonel effected an escape of which a romantic account is given by Father Forbes-Leith in his 'Narratives of Scottish Catholics' (p. 368). The privy council now (Aug. 20) issued an order 'against resetting William Semple, who had come on a pretended mission from the Prince of Parma and had been trafficking treasonably with His Majesty's subjects.' Before leaving Scotland for the Low Countries Sempill made arrangements for carrying on a secret correspondence with his friends; and in February of the following year his servant, Pringle, was captured in England with a packet of treasonable letters, directed by Huntly, Errol, and others to Parma and the king of Spain. Pringle confessed to Walsingham that he had been sent over from Flanders by Sempill six weeks before. The colonel's name frequently reappears in the state papers of 1593-4 in connection with the Spanish intrigues and military enterprises of that time, but he does not seem to have again visited Scotland.

In 1598 he married in Spain Doña Marina de Ledesma, widow of Don Juan Perez de Alizaga, and daughter of Don Juan de Ledesma, member of the council of India. In 1598 Robert, the fourth lord Sempill, who had been appointed Scottish ambassador at Madrid, was instructed by James to sound the intentions of Philip III with regard to the succession to the English crown. Lord Sempill in his correspondence frequently mentions the assistance he had received from 'the crunal my cusing,' while the colonel himself wrote to James (12 Oct. 1598) of 'the lang intension that I haif haid to die in my cuntre in yo' Ma<sup>ties</sup> service' (Miscellaneous Papers, Maitland Club, p. 178). Sempill lived to a great age, occupying at the Spanish court the office of 'gentleman of the mouth' to the king, and busying himself with the affairs of the catholic missionaries in Scotland to whose support he liberally contributed, as is shown by the letter of Father Archangel Leslie, addressed to the colonel 20 June 1630, printed in the 'Historical Records of the Family of Leslie' (vol. iii, p. 421).

In 1613 Philip III had granted to Sempill the house of Jacomotrezo in Madrid as an equivalent of the sums due to him in arrears of salaries and pensions. This house he designed and endowed as a college for the education of catholic missionaries who were to be drawn from the gentry of Scotland, and by preference from members of his own family. The government of the college was to be in the hands of the Jesuit fathers. The original deed of foundation and endowment, dated 10 May 1628, was printed by the Maitland Club (Miscellaneous Papers), together with a translation of the colonel's testament, dated 20 Feb. 1633. He died in this house on 1 March 1633, at the age of eighty-seven. His wife survived him, dying on 10 Sept. 1646.

[Consensus, De duplice statu, p. 144; Gordon's Catholic Church in Scotland, p. 66; Forbes-Leith's Narratives, following an anonymous contribution to the Catholic Directory for Scotland, 1873 (but untrustworthy on Sempill's military career); for particulars of the betrayal of Liere, Bergmann's Geschiedenis der Stad Lier, pp. 265-272, based upon the rare contemporary pamphlet, Bref Discours de la trahison advenue en la ville de Liere en Brabant par un capitaine escossois nommé Guillaume Sempile, etc., 1682; Strada, De bello Belgico (ed. 1649), ii. 233; Meteren, Hist. des Pays-Bas, t. 217; Calderwood's Hist. iv. 680, v. 6; Reg. Privy Council, ii. 229; Piteaign's Trials, i. 172, 322; Teulet, Papiers d'Etat, iii. 586, 592; Cal. State Papers, Scotland, 553, 640, 804; Border Papers, i. 310, 860, &c.] T. G. L.

SEMPLE. [See also SEMPILL.]

SEMPLE, DAVID (1808-1878), antiquary, was born at Townhead, Paisley, on 21 Aug. 1808. Educated in the local grammar school and trained in a lawyer's office, he settled in business on his own account in Paisley, and was considered an able conveyancer. He was long the agent for the liberals of the burgh. He was elected a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland. He died at Paisley on 23 Dec. 1878.

Semple's works—mainly dealing with local history—are: 1. 'Poll-tax Rolls of Renfrewshire of 1695,' published in 1862. 2. 'The Laids of Glen' and 'History of the Cross Steeple,' 1868. 3. 'St. Mirin, with two supplements, a learned and patient treatise on the patron saint of Paisley, 1872. 4. 'Barons and Barony of Renfrewshire,' 1876. 5. 'The Tree of Crookston,' 1876. 6. 'Abbey Bridge of Paisley,' 1878. He also prepared a complete edition of Tannahill's 'Poems,' with a memoir and notes (Glasgow, 1870, 8vo).

[Irving's Book of Eminent Scotsmen; Brown's Paisley Poets.] T. B.

SEMPLE, GEORGE (1700?-1782?), Irish architect, son of a builder's labourer, was born in Dublin about 1700. His earliest known work is the steeple (103 feet in height) of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, which he designed and erected in 1749. He also built St. Patrick's Hospital (1749-57), and several private mansions, including Ramsfort, co. Wexford, which was afterwards destroyed. His best known work was Essex Bridge across the Liffey. This was begun in 1752, and completed in 1764, and was considered one of the best bridges in Ireland. The government awarded him £500l. for his services. Essex Bridge was taken down in 1872, being replaced by the present Grattan Bridge, from Parliament Street to Capel Street. In 1777 Semple was living in Queen Street, Dublin, and died late in 1781 or early in 1782. His immediate descendants were also architects. He published a treatise 'On Building in Water' (Dublin, 1776, 4to).

[Gilbert's Hist. of Dublin; Whitelaw and Walsh's Hist. of Dublin; Dublin directories, 1770-82; Pasquin's Artists of Ireland. Redgrave erroneously gives his name as Temple.]
D. J. O'D.

SEMPLE alias SEMPLE-LISLE, JAMES GEORGE (A. 1799), adventurer, who also passed under the names Maxwell, Harrod, and Grant, was born at Irvine in 1769, and was the son of James Semple, formerly an exciseman, who eventually laid claim to the extinct title of Viscount Lisle. In 1776 he was serving in America, where he was taken prisoner, but was released in 1777, and returned to England. He then became acquainted with Mrs. Eliza Gooch the novelist. Marrying a goddaughter of the notorious Duchess of Kingston [see CHUDLEIGH, ELIZABETH], he accompanied the latter to the continent. There he claims to have accompanied Frederick the Great during his bloodless campaign of 1778, to have been introduced to the Empress Catharine of Russia, to have accompanied Prince Potemkin to the Crimea, and to have designed a uniform for the Russian army. He also visited Copenhagen. Returning to England in 1784, he was arrested for obtaining goods by false pretences, and on 2 Sept. 1786 was sentenced to seven years' transportation. Released on condition of quitting England, he repaired to Paris, where he represents himself as serving on General Berruyer's staff, and as witnessing in that capacity the execution of Louis XVI. Returning to England in time to avoid arrest, he was again, on 18 Feb. 1795, sentenced to transportation for defrauding tradesmen. Disappointed in his hopes of pardon, he stabbed himself in Newgate in 1796, when about to be shipped for Botany Bay, and tried to starve himself to death. He recovered, however, and in 1798 was despatched in the Lady Jane Shore transport, bound for Australia. During the voyage a mutiny broke out, Semple's warning of the plot having been disregarded by the captain, Wilcox. Semple, with several others, was allowed to put off in a boat, landed in South America, and, after many adventures, reached Tangier, where he surrendered, and was sent back to England. He was committed to Tothill Fields prison, and at the time of publishing his autobiography in 1799 was still confined there. Nothing further is known of him. A portrait engraved by Barlow is mentioned by Bromley.

[Life, 1799; Mem. of the Northern Impostor, 1786; Life of Mrs. E. S. Gooch, 1792; Ann. Register, 1796, App. p. 46, and 1798, App. p. 60; Gent. Mag. 1796.] J. G. A.

SEMPLE, ROBERT (1766-1816), traveller, and governor under the Hudson's Bay Company, son of British parents, who were made prisoners during the American war of independence, was born at Boston, Massachusetts, in 1766. Brought up to mercantile pursuits, he was associated with London firms, and travelled constantly in the course of business, recording his impressions and adventures in short plain narratives which were favourably received. He was in Cape Colony in 1802, and made a stay of some duration, journeying inland a short distance. In 1803 he was back in London, and on 26 June 1805 left for a journey through Spain and Italy to Naples, and thence to Smyrna and Constantinople. In 1808 and 1809 he made a second journey in Portugal and Spain, eventually going to Gibraltar and Tangier. In 1810 he travelled in the West Indies and Brazil, and was in Caracas, Venezuela, at the beginning of the rebellion against Spain. In 1813 he made an adventurous journey in the rear of the allied armies from Hamburg by Berlin to Gothenburg; he was on this occasion taken for an American spy by Lord Cathcart and placed under arrest.

In 1815 Semple was chosen by the influence of Lord Selkirk to be chief agent or governor of the Hudson's Bay Company's factories and territories. Leaving England in June, he arrived at Red River in September, and energetically moved from place to place inspecting the settlements. In the spring of 1816 he was back at Red River. There had long been a feud between the Hudson's Bay Company and the North-West Company. On 19 June 1816 a caravan belonging to the latter company was passing near the fort at Red River with the intention of occupying ground to which their right was disputed. Semple rode out with an escort to meet them. A fracas ensued in which shots were exchanged, and Semple was mortally wounded, dying soon after he was carried into the fort. A literature of re-creation between the two companies was the chief result of the affair.

Semple was admitted even by his opponents to have been just and honourable in his short administration. He had a taste for literature and science. His chief writings are: 1. 'Walks and Sketches at the Cape of Good Hope, &c.' London, 1803. 2. 'Observations on a Journey through Spain and Italy to Naples, &c. in 1805,' London, 1807, 2 vols. 8vo. 3. 'A Second Journey in Spain in the Spring of 1809, &c.' London, 1810 (2nd edition, 1812). 4. 'Sketch of the Present State of Caracas,' London, 1812.

5. 'Observations made on a Tour from Hamburg through Berlin to Gothenburg,' London, 1814. 6. 'Charles Ellis, or the Friends,' a novel, London, 1814.

[Works in Brit. Mus. Libr.; A review in A. Collection of Modern . . . Voyages and Travels, London, 1808; Edinburgh Review, 1814, vol. xxii.; Gent. Mag. 1816, pt. ii. p. 454; Halkett's Statement respecting the Earl of Selkirk's Settlement . . . and the Massacre of Governor Semple, London, 1817; Lord Selkirk's Narrative of Occurrences respecting Lord Selkirk's Settlement, &c. 1817; note on p. viii of Amos's Report of Trials, &c. against Lord Selkirk, London, 1820.]

C. A. H.

SEMPRINGHAM, GILBERT OF (1083?-1189), founder of the Gilbertines. [See GILBERT.]

SEMUR, JOHN (fl. 1380), Minorite astronomer. [See SOMER.]

SEANAN (488?-544?), saint and bishop, was son of Gergan, who was descended from Conaire I, king of Ireland. He is one of the nine saints of the race of Conaire who are classed apart in the 'Leabhar Breac' and the 'Book of Leinster' as being held in high esteem in Munster. They are divided into groups of three, each group having a special title. Seanan belonged to the last three, the 'Torches' as they were termed. Born about 488 in Corcobaskin, co. Clare, he, when arrived at man's estate, was compelled by the local chieftain to join in a foray on the adjoining territory of Corcomroe. But he took no part in their deeds of violence; and when the expedition was defeated and he was taken prisoner, this led to his life being spared. Dissatisfied with this wild life, he resolved to enter a religious community, and for this purpose placed himself under the instruction of Cassidan, whose church was at Irrus, co. Clare. From him he went to St. Natal of Kilnarnagh, near Kilkenny. He is next said to have visited Rome and Tours, and also St. David's in Wales, and to have brought home a copy of the Gospels written by St. Martin. This was known afterwards as 'Sean's Gospel.' On the completion of his studies his first settlement was on the Great Island in Cork Harbour, according to the metrical Irish life by Colman, son of Lanin. From this he went to Iniscarra, on the river Lee, where he had not been long settled when Lugaid, chief of the district, demanded tribute from him. This Sean refused, and an angry discussion took place; but in the end the claim was withdrawn at the instance of Lugaid's friends. While here fifty Roman pilgrims arrived in Cork Harbour, many of whom were hospitably received by Sean. We next read of his building a church at Inishuinge, which Lanigan believed to be one of the islands in the Shannon. But this is an error, as it was situated in the parish of Iniscarra, where the ruins of a later structure on the same site still bear the name. Descending the river Lee Sean sailed round the western coast, touching at Inistuskur, off the coast of Kerry, where he passed some time. The churches and beehive houses at Olean Senaig, one of the Magharees off the Bay of Tralee, have been attributed to him, but erroneously, as Senach, after whom they are named, is a different person, though he also was one of the famous nine. Passing on to Iniscaorach, or Mutton Island, he finally reached Iniscathaigh, at the mouth of the Shannon, so called from a monster named the Cathach, which he expelled from the island. Here occurred the visit of St. Canair of Bantry to him which has been immortalised by Moore in his ballad of 'St. Senanus and the Lady.'

Iniscathaigh is reckoned by Keating among the bishoprics of the province of Oshel, and, according to Ussher, it was subsequently divided between the sees of Limerick, Ardfer, and Aghadoe. Its importance is attested by its round tower; and as late as the reign of Elizabeth we find mention of the 'converbship' (coarbship) of Iniscathy, to which large revenues appear to have been attached, and which had then passed into lay hands. Sean's fame was chiefly in the west of Ireland, where numerous churches were dedicated to him. He is also the patron of Lansannan in Denbighshire, and Bedwely in Monmouthshire, and one of the patrons of Lantressant in Anglesey, and is thought to have given his name to Sennen in Cornwall. Bishop Forbes has identified him with the Scottish saint Kerrog and with the French St. Sané, one of the chief patrons of the diocese of Poitiers. His golden bell—heaven-sent, as it was believed—was in existence as late as 1834, but is now lost. The ancient poet, Dallan Forgaill, composed a panegyric on him termed the 'Amra Senain,' a copy of which is in the 'Leabhar Breac,' and another in the Royal Library of Brussels. His day in the calendar is 8 March, which, however, is not that of his death, but of his burial. He is said to have died in 544.

[Bollandists' Acta Sanct. 8 March, i. 759-98; O'Curry's Lectures on the Manuscript Materials of Ancient Irish History, p. 339, and on the Manners and Customs of the Ancient Irish, vol. i. p. cccxxix; Leabhar Breac (facsimile), 241a; MSS. 4190-200, Royal Library, Brussels; Lanigan's Eccl. Hist. i. 444-6, ii. 2 seq., 20, 89-91; Betha

Shenau, from the Book of Lismore, translated by Whitley Stokes; Anecdota Oxoniensia, Oxford, 1890; Cal. Stats Papers, Ireland, Elizabeth, 1874-85.] T. O.

SENATUS, called BRAYONIUS (d. 1207), prior of Worcester, rose to that dignity after filling the offices of precentor and librarian. He taught in the monastery and did much to develop the school. As librarian he made a concordance of the gospels, addressed to Master Alured, by whose order it was written. He quotes many authorities, and refers to the copy of Offa's Bible sent from Rome, and then preserved at Worcester. The dedicatory letter has been printed from a manuscript at Conches addressed to Master S. (MARTENE and DURAND, Theat. Anecd. i. 484). In the Corpus MS. (Cambridge) No. 48 the whole work is extant in Senatus's autograph. He also wrote a life of St. Oswald [q. v.], bishop of Worcester, and afterwards archbishop of York, which has been printed by Raine (Church Historians of York, ii. 80). It is extant in the Durham MS. B. iv. 39, where it is followed by the manuscript life of St. Wulstan [q. v.], bishop of Worcester, which is probably also by Senatus. It may be a Latin translation of the English life by Colman, monk of Worcester (HARDY, Descr. Cat. ii. 72). Another Latin translation of this biography in Cott. Claud. A. v. is by William of Malmesbury (WHARTON, vol. ii. p. xv).

In the Bodleian MS. N.E.B. 2. 1. are six letters written by Senatus as prior: to Roger, bishop of Worcester; to Master Alured (as above); to John Comyn, archbishop of Dublin, 'de loria canonicis' (two copies); to Clement, prior of Osney, praising the schools of Oxford; to Master Alured, 'de officio et orationibus missæ'; and to William de Tunbridge, 'de attributis divinis.' In the Lambeth MS. 238, fo. 207, is his 'expositio in canonem missæ,' dedicated to Master Alured (WHARTON, i. 548). Leland saw a collection of his letters at Worcester (Coll. iii. 160). Senatus resigned the priorate on 20 Nov. 1190, and died in 1207.

[Wharton's Anglia Sacra; Ann. Wigorn. and Tavesh. (Rolls Ser.); Bernard's Catalogus of Manuscripts; Dugdale's Monasticon Anglicanum; Tanner's Bibliotheca.] M. B.

SENOCHAN (fl. 649), Irish bard, is generally mentioned with the epithet Torpeist in Irish literature to distinguish him from Senchan, son of Coemlog, and nephew of Coemgin of Glendalough (Felire, pp. 51, 98, 168); from Senchan, son of Colman Mor, slain in 590; from the three Senchans, successively abbots of Emly, who died in 709, 776, and 780; and from Senchan, abbot of Killeigh in Offaly, who died in 791. Like the famous Torna, foster-father of Niall (d. 405) [q. v.], he sometimes bears the epithet Eigeas, learned. He was a native of Connaught, and became chief bard of that region when Guaire was its king (649-652). In the story called 'Imtheacht na Tromdhaimhe' ('The Departure of the Poets' College'), which is one of the later appendages of the 'Tain Bo Cuailgne' ('the Cattle Raid of Cuailgne'), it is stated that on the death of Dallan Forgaill [see DALLAN, SAINT] four learned women were consulted by the ollavs of Ireland as to who his successor as chief bard of Ireland should be. Muireann, Dallan's wife, one of the four, said that Dallan had expressed a wish for Senchan to succeed him. Senchan then composed a funeral oration in verse for Dallan, beginning 'Inmhain corp a dtorchair sunn' ('Dear the body that here lies dead'), and was unanimously elected ardollamh, or chief professor of Ireland. He and his college, to the number of three hundred, with nearly four hundred attendants and a hundred and fifty dogs, went to Durlus, the court of Guaire, where the events took place which led to the recovery of the then lost story called 'Tain Bo Cuailgne.' As Dallan was famous in the reign of Aedh mac Ainmire, who died in 584, and as he survived Columba [q. v.], Senchan's asserted succession to his bardic supremacy about the commencement of the reign of Guaire in 649 presents no chronological inconsistency. The oldest copy of 'Imtheacht na Tromdhaimhe' at present extant is in the book of MacCarthy Riach, a manuscript of about 1480. The tale is not mentioned in 'Leabhar na Huidri,' a manuscript of about 1100, which contains a copy of the 'Tain Bo Cuailgne.' In the 'Book of Leinster,' a manuscript of 1150, in which there is another copy of the 'Tain Bo Cuailgne,' there is a chapter headed 'Do fallsignd tana bo cualgne,' fol. 245 ('Of the Discovery of the Tain Bo Cuailgne'), in which it is stated that Senchan assembled the bards of Ireland in order to recover at length the whole story. Only fragments were then known, and he sent forth scholars to seek far and wide for the complete text. The 'Book of Leinster' (fol. 28, col. 1, line 10) also contains the only extant work of Senchan. It is a poem beginning 'Rofich fergus fíocht catha co cumnigi' ('Fergus stoutly fought twenty battles'); but after one other line referring to Fergus, it goes on to celebrate the battles of Rudraigi, king of Ireland. It is a catalogue of names, with epithets to fill up the gaps in the metre. In the glossary of Cormac, under the word 'prúill,' great increase, is a story of a voyage made by Senchan to the Isle of Man, and of an incident in it given as the origin of his cognomen. A monster came into the boat—'Is desin rohaímniged Senchan Torpeist i Senchan dororpa paist'—it was from that he was named Senchan Torpeist: i.e. Senchan to whom appeared a monster. The date of his death is not mentioned in the chronicles.

[Book of Leinster, facsimile of manuscript published by Royal Irish Acad.; Owen Cormacallan in Trans. of Ossianic Soc. vol. v.; E. O'Curry's Lectures on the Manuscript Materials for Irish Hist.; Whitley Stokes's Three Irish Glossaries, 1862, and Calendar of Oengus, 1871; B. O'Flaherty's Ogygia, London, 1885.] N. M.

SENEX, JOHN (d. 1740), cartographer and engraver, had in 1719 a bookseller's establishment at the Globe in Salisbury Court, Fleet Street. Here Ephraim Chambers [q. v.] was for some time his apprentice. Senex engraved the plates for the London almanacs from 1717 to 1727, except in 1723; and he executed the cuts for the second edition of Sir William Browne's 'Account of Microscopes and Telescopes.' He was, however, chiefly known as a cartographer and globe-maker. He printed with C. Price, probably in 1710, 'Proposals for a New Set of Correct Maps.' In that year he issued, with Price and John Maxwell, maps of North America and Germany, and in 1712 one of 'Moscovy.' They appeared collectively in 1714 as 'The English Atlas,' under the joint names of Senex and Maxwell. 'A new General Atlas' followed in 1721. Senex 'improved, very much corrected, and made portable' John Ogilby's 'Survey of all the Principal Roads of England and Wales,' in 1719, and corrected and enlarged P. Gordon's 'Geography Anatomized,' in 1722 (reissued in 1730, 1735, and 1740). About 1720 he, with two others, made a representation to the House of Commons on the subject of a new globular projection. He was admitted a fellow of the Royal Society on 4 July 1728, and read there on 4 May 1738 a paper on his 'Contrivance to make the Poles of the Diurnal Motion in a Celestial Globe pass round the Poles of the Ecliptic.' The celestial globe was to be 'so adjusted as to exhibit not only the risings and settings of the stars, in all ages, and in all latitudes, but the other phenomena likewise, that depend upon the motion of the diurnal axis round the annual axis.' Senex died on 30 Dec. 1740. Many of his maps are in the library of Trinity College, Dublin.

[Gent. Mag. 1741, p. 50; Notes and Queries, 2nd ser. x. 8, 187, 237; Nichols's Lit. Anecdotes, iii. 315, v. 659, vi. 94 n.; Phil. Trans. 1738 pp. 203-4; Bryan's Dict. of Painters and Engravers; Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Allibone's Dict. Engl. Lit.; Brit. Mus. Cat.] G. L. G. N.

SENGHAM, WILLIAM (A. 1200), Austin friar, of humble parentage, took the Augustinian habit at Rome in his youth, and was sent to teach in England, together with Albertinus de Verona, by Lanfranc, prior-general of the order. By Sengham's industry twenty houses of Austin friars were founded. Nicassius Baxius wrote of him:

'Anglia me genuit, formavit Roma, recepit Anglia, quo caperet quæ mihi Roma dedit.'

Tanner attributes to him the following works, of which only the last is known to be extant: 1. 'De Claustro Animæ.' 2. 'De Professione Novitiorum.' 3. 'De Tentationum Remediis.' 4. 'Scripturarum Explicationes.' 5. An Index to the 'De Fide et Legibus,' ascribed to William Perault, extant in a manuscript belonging to the dean and chapter of Lincoln. Thomas Colby, bishop of Waterford, made indices to his works and praised his teaching.

[Ossinger's Bibl. August.; Tanner's Bibliotheca; Bale's Scriptores.] M. B.

SENHOUSE, SIR HUMPHREY FLEMING (1781-1841), captain in the navy, baptised on 6 June 1781, was third son of William Senhouse (1741-1800), lieutenant R.N., surveyor-general of Barbados and the Leeward Islands, by Elizabeth, daughter of Samson Wood, speaker of the Barbados assembly. His grandfather, Humphrey Senhouse of Netherhall, Cumberland, married Mary, daughter and coheir of Sir George Fleming [q. v.], bishop of Carlisle. He entered the navy in January 1797 on board the Prince of Wales, flagship of Rear-admiral (Sir) Henry Harvey [q. v.], in the West Indies. In November 1797 he was moved into the Requin brig, in which he came for the first time to England towards the end of 1799. From March 1800 to April 1802 he served in the Fisgard under the command of Captain (afterwards Sir) Thomas Byam Martin [q. v.], and Captain (afterwards Sir) Michael Seymour [q. v.]. On 7 April 1802 he passed his examination, and two days afterwards was promoted to be lieutenant of the Galgo. In May 1803 he was appointed to the Conqueror with Captain (afterwards Sir) Thomas Louis [q. v.]. With Israel Pellew [q. v.], who relieved Louis in April 1804, he served in the Mediterranean, in the voyage to the West Indies, and in the battle of Trafalgar, till January 1806. He then went out to the West Indies in the Elephant, was put on board the Northumberland flagship of Sir Alexander Forrester Inglis Cochrane [q. v.], and in September 1806 was appointed to command the Express on the Spanish Main and among the Leeward Islands till March 1808, when he joined the Belleisle as flag-lieutenant to Sir Alexander Cochrane. Cochrane sent him home with despatches in the following July. On 26 Jan. 1809 he rejoined the admiral, now in the Neptuns, and served through the reduction of Martinique. For this, on 7 March, he was promoted to the Wolverene, which, and afterwards the Ringdove and Supérieure, he commanded in the West Indies till the following December. In 1810-12 he commanded the Recruit at Gibraltar, Newfoundland, and Halifax; and in 1812-14 the Martin on the Halifax station.

On 12 Oct. 1814 he was advanced to post rank, and from April to September 1815 commanded the Superb on the coast of France, as flag-captain to Sir Henry Hotham [q. v.]. He was again with Hotham in the Mediterranean, as flag-captain in the St. Vincent, which he commanded from 1831 to 1834. On 13 April 1832 he was nominated a K.C.H., and was knighted on 5 June 1834. In April 1839 he commissioned the Blenheim, which he took out to China, where he died, on 14 June 1841, of fever contracted by fatigue and exposure during the operations at Canton. He was buried at Macao. Fifteen days after his death he was nominated a C.B. He married, in 1810, Elizabeth, daughter of Vice-admiral John Manley, and left two daughters.

[O'Byrne's Nav. Biogr. Dict. p. 1049 n.; Marshall's Roy. Nav. Biogr. vii. (suppl. pt. iii.) 405; Times, 8, 9 Oct. 1841; Genl. Mag. 1841, ii. 654; service-book in the Public Record Office.] J. K. L.

SENHOUSE, RICHARD (d. 1626), bishop of Carlisle, was third son of John Senhouse (d. 1604) of Netherhall, Cumberland, by Anne, daughter of John Ponsonby of Hail Hall. The father was an antiquary who collected Roman remains. Sir Robert Cotton visited him in 1599. Richard was educated, according to Jefferson, first at Trinity and afterwards at St. John's College, Cambridge, whence he graduated M.A. in 1598 (incorporated at Oxford in 1600), and proceeded B.D. by grace of 15 Feb. 1606, D.D. in 1622. He became fellow of St. John's on 7 April 1598. He was a good preacher, and became chaplain successively to the Earl of Bedford, Prince Charles, and King James I. In 1606 he was appointed vicar of Bumpsted Stesple, Essex; in 1608 he was rector of Cheam, Surrey, and on 18 Dec. 1621 he became dean of Gloucester. He was made bishop of Carlisle on 26 Sept. 1624, and preached the coronation sermon for Charles I. He died, it is said owing to a fall from his horse, on 6 May 1626, and was buried in the cathedral. A volume containing four sermons by him was published, London, 1627, 4to.

[Burke's Landed Gentry, ii. 1819; Jefferson's Hist. of Carlisle, pp. 182, 218; Hutchinson's Cumberland, ii. 631; Baker's Hist. of St. John's Coll. i. 292, ii. 615; Le Neve's Fasti, i. 444, iii. 242; information from Mr. Chancellor Ferguson; Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1623-6, pp. 304, 389, 363; Stowe MS. 76, f. 248.] W. A. J. A.

SENHOUSE or SEVER, WILLIAM (d. 1505), bishop of Durham, whose name appears as Senhouse, Senews, Senuz, Sever, and Siveyer, was born at Shincliffe, a village close to Durham. He is said to have been related to, as he has often been confused with, Henry Sever [q. v.]; but more probably he was connected with the Senhouse family of Cumberland, a later member of which, Richard Senhouse [q. v.], became, like William, bishop of Carlisle. William entered the Benedictine order, and is said by Wood to have been educated either in Gloucester College or Durham College, Oxford. On 11 March 1467-8 he was ordained sub-deacon in St. Mary's Abbey, York, where he became abbot in 1485. In 1495 he was elected bishop of Carlisle, the temporalities being restored to him on 11 Dec.; he was consecrated in the following year. In 1496 he was one of the commissioners sent to Scotland to negotiate the marriage of Henry VII's daughter Margaret with James IV, and he helped to arrange the treaty that was signed in the following year. In 1499 he was appointed one of the conservators of the truce between the two kingdoms (cf. Cal. Hatfield MSS. i. 3). In 1502 he was translated to Durham, resigning the abbey of St. Mary, which he had hitherto held. He died in 1505, and was buried at St. Mary's Abbey, York.

[Le Neve's Fasti Eccl. Anglicanæ, iii. 240, 292; Godwin, De Præsulibus, ed. Richardson; Letters and Papers ill. the Reigns of Richard III and Henry VII (Rolls Ser.), ii. 288; Hutchinson's Cumberland, ii. 268, 627; Strtees's Hist. Durham, iv. 106; Wood's Athenæ Oxon. ii. 695; Testamenta Eboracensia (Strtees Soc.), pta. iii. and iv. passim; Brodrick's Memorials of Merton Coll. p. 229; Dodd's Church Hist.] A. F. P.

SENIOR, NASSAU WILLIAM (1790-1864), economist, born 26 Sept. 1790 at Compton Beauchamp, Berkshire, was the eldest of ten children of the Rev. John Raven Senior, vicar of Darnford, Wiltshire, by his wife Mary, daughter of Henry Duke, solicitor-general of Barbados. J. R. Senior was the only son of Nassau Thomas and grandson of Aaron Senior, a Spaniard naturalised in England in 1723. He was a graduate of Merton College, Oxford (B.A. 1785, M.A. 1788), and is said to have been a man of remarkable abilities, though he was content with the quiet life of a country clergyman. He died at Umberthorne, Gloucestershire in 1824. His wife was a woman of great beauty, sweetness, and strong practical sense. Nassau Senior's early education was conducted by his father, from whom he imbibed a permanent love of classical literature. He entered Eton on 4 July 1803, and in 1807 was elected a demy of Magdalen College, Oxford. The college tutor desired to make his office a sinecure, and, though Senior's conduct as a student was irreproachable, his reading was self-directed and desultory. He failed at his first appearance in the schools, on account of a hasty answer to a question in divinity and a consequent discussion with the examiner. Stung by the failure, he told his father that he would win a first-class next term. He engaged the services of (Archbishop) Whately, then eminent as a private tutor. He worked unremittingly, formed a lifelong friendship with Whately, and after a few months took a first-class in lit. hum. in 1811. He graduated B.A. in January 1812, and M.A. in 1815. In 1812 he became probationary fellow of Magdalen, and in 1813 Vinerian scholar. He had entered at Lincoln's Inn on 19 Nov. 1810, and in 1812 began his legal studies in London. In 1813 he became a pupil of Sugden (Lord St. Leonards), with whom he formed a warm friendship. He became a certificated conveyancer about 1817, was called to the bar on 28 June 1819, and, when Sugden abandoned conveyancing, succeeded to much of his tutor's practice. A delicate throat and weak voice prevented him from succeeding in other branches of the profession. Among his pupils and friends were Romilly, master of the rolls, C. P. Villiers, Edward Denison (afterwards bishop of Salisbury), and Richard Ford, of the 'Hand-book of Spain.' In 1821 he married Mary Charlotte, daughter of John Mair of Iron Acton, and settled in Kensington Square. He then built a house in Kensington Gore, which he occupied from 1827 to the end of his life. His hospitality there led Sydney Smith to call it the chapel of ease 'to Lansdowne House.' Though a steady worker, he was from the first eminently sociable.

Senior's attention had been especially directed to political economy. He had been much impressed by the evils of misdirected charity in his father's parish, and at the age of twenty-five, as he afterwards said, resolved to reform the English poor law. His first publication upon economic questions was an article upon the state of agriculture in the 'Quarterly Review' for July 1821. It is a criticism of a well-known report of a committee of the House of Commons, and an orthodox exposition of free-trade doctrine.

He became a member of the Political Economy Club in 1823, and for many years took a very active part in their debates (Minutes, privately printed, 1882). In 1823 he was chosen as the first holder of the professorship of political economy at Oxford, founded in that year by Henry Drummond [q. v.] He held it for five years, when he was succeeded by his friend Whately. He afterwards held it for another term, from 1847 to 1852. He published several lectures, which won him a reputation both in England and France.

In 1830, at the request of the home secretary, Lord Melbourne, he prepared a report upon trade combinations, the substance of which is given in his 'Historical and Philosophical Essays.' In 1833 he was appointed a member of the poor-law commission, and was the author of the famous report upon which was founded the poor law of 1834. Senior's writings upon this subject show his thorough familiarity with the history and actual working of the laws, and a principal share in the credit of one of the most beneficial measures of his time must be assigned to him. A sum of 500*l.* and a knighthood were offered to him for these services. He declined both, and afterwards refused offers of a Canadian governorship and of the position of legal member of the Indian Council. He also declined a place on the new poor-law board. He was appointed master in chancery on 10 June 1836, and he held the office until its abolition in 1855, when he retired upon his full salary. He was in later years a member of several royal commissions—the factory commission of 1837, the hand-loom commission of 1841, the Irish poor-law commission of 1844, and the education commission of 1857.

Senior had at an early period become well known in official and literary circles in London society. Among his chief friends were Whately, Sydney Smith, Lord Lansdowne, Copleston, Sir G. Cornwall Lewis, and Sir James Stephen. Besides his economical writings he had contributed several articles to the 'Quarterly' and 'London' reviews upon the 'Waverley Novels,' which are warmly praised and often quoted by Lockhart (Life of Scott, ch. liv.) At a later period he wrote an article upon 'Vanity Fair' in the 'Edinburgh Review,' which was of great service, as Thackeray always considered, to the growth of the author's reputation. He was, however, chiefly interested in politics, and his most important articles appeared in the 'Edinburgh Review' after 1840. Brougham speaks of him as a 'great acquisition' in a letter to Macvey Napier of 16 July 1841 (Napier Correspondence, p. 362), and for several years he wrote many articles upon political and economic questions. Many references in the letters to Napier show that these articles were highly valued at the time, and written after consultation with the most trusted authorities of the party. Sir James Stephen writes to Napier in 1842 (ib. p. 379), that Senior 'cannot be too highly valued in his own peculiar walk, which is that of comprehensive, mature, and luminous thinking about permanent national interests.' Senior was, of course, in general sympathy with the whigs of the time, though he was always rather judicial than partisan in his political views. He had been brought into contact not only with Englishmen, but with foreigners of eminence. Alexis de Tocqueville had sought his acquaintance in 1833, and formed a lifelong intimacy. In 1836 Cavour, on his first visit to London, also became a friend, and mentions him in 1844 (Comte Cavour et la Comtesse de Circourt, Lettres inédites, Rome, 1854) as 'l'esprit le plus éclairé de la Grande-Bretagne.' Senior made frequent visits to the continent. He was in Paris during the attack upon the national assembly on 15 May 1848. He then began to keep a full journal, and from this time till 1868 recorded conversations with many distinguished men in France and elsewhere. These were frequently revised by the original speakers. Senior took great care to avoid any breach of private confidence; but these records of the opinions of contemporary statesmen upon matters of high importance are often of great historical value. Large parts of them have been published by his daughter, Mrs. Simpson, since his death. The list of his works (see below) gives an indication of the width of his interests, and his desire of obtaining the views of the ablest men of various parties.

Senior was eminently a man of strong common-sense. He was of a placid disposition, and thoroughly enjoyed life. He had a characteristic dislike to dwelling upon painful topics, and maintained a steady reserve on some points. He advises a young friend to study theology carefully, but if he formed unusual opinions, to mention them to none but his most intimate friends. He was a man of strong affections, though not demonstrative in his utterance, and most steadily attached to his numerous friends.

He died at his house in Kensington on 4 June 1864, leaving a widow and two children. His daughter, Mary Charlotte Mair, married Mr. C. T. Simpson. His son, Nassau John (1822-1891), married in 1848 Jane Elizabeth (b. 10 Dec. 1828), daughter of John Hughes, of Donnington Priory, and sister of the author of 'Tom Brown's School-days.' Mrs. Nassau John Senior, a very graceful and accomplished woman, was also generally loved for simplicity and sweetness of character. She took great interest in social questions, and on 18 Jan. 1874 was made temporary inspector of workhouses and pauper schools. She was the first woman to hold such a position. The appointment was made permanent in February 1874, but an illness ultimately fatal forced her to resign in November. Her observations led her to originate the 'Association for Befriending Young Servants,' which has been of much service. (The 'Spectator' of 31 March and 7 April 1877 describes her work.) She received the medal of the Red Cross Society for her work in the London office during the war of 1870-1871. Mrs. Senior died on 24 March 1877. Her portrait, by Mr. G. F. Watts, R.A., belongs to Mr. Walter Senior.

Senior, says Cossa (Introduction to the Study of Political Economy, 1893, p. 327), deserves the first place among the English economists between Ricardo and J. S. Mill. He wrote much that was valuable upon the distribution of the precious metals, and the causes which determine the rate of wages. He is often noticed for his introduction of the phrase 'abstinence,' to describe the motive for the accumulation of capital. He belonged in the main to the school of Ricardo, whom, however, he criticises freely; but his strong common-sense and interest in practical applications of his principles prevent him from stating his doctrine in the absolute form of James Mill and McCulloch. He was especially influenced by Malthus, whose theory he applied to the great reform of the poor laws. Senior was a corresponding member of the French Institute (Sciences morales et politiques).

His separately published works are: 1. 'Introductory Lectures before the University of Oxford,' 1827. 2. 'Three Lectures on the Transmission of the Precious Metals. . .' 1828, 2nd edit. 1830. 3. 'Two Lectures on Population. . .' (Easter Term, 1828, and correspondence with Malthus), 1829. 4. 'Three Lectures on the Rate of Wages, with preface on the Causes and Remedies of the late Disturbances,' 1830. 5. 'Three Lectures on the cost of obtaining Money, and on the effects of Private and Government Paper Money,' 1830. 6. 'Letter to Lord Howick on a Legal Provision for the Irish Poor, Commutation of Tithes, and a Provision for the Irish Roman Catholic Clergy,' 1831. 7. 'Statement of the Provision of the Poor and of the Condition of the Labouring Classes . . .', 1835. 8. 'An Outline of the Science of Political Economy,' 1836. This formed part of the 'Encyclopædia Metropolitana.' It was reprinted separately in 1850 in 'Political Economy,' and reached a sixth edition in 1872. 9. 'Letters on the Factory Act as it affects the Cotton Manufacturers,' 1837. 10. 'A Lecture on the Production of Wealth,' 1849. 11. 'Four Introductory Letters on Political Economy,' 1852. 12. 'American Slavery' (reprint, with additions of a review of 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' in the 'Edinburgh Review'), 1856. 13. 'A Journal kept in Turkey and Greece . . . (in 1857-8),' 1859. 14. 'Suggestions on Popular Education,' 1861. 15. 'Biographical Sketches,' 1863. 16. 'Essays on Fiction,' 1864. Posthumous publications, edited by his daughter, are: 17. 'Journals, Conversations, and Essays relating to Ireland' (prepared for publication by Senior, includes a journal of 1852 and earlier articles), 2 vols. 1868. 18. 'Historical and Philosophical Essays,' 2 vols. 1866. 19. 'Journals kept in France and Italy from 1848 to 1852,' 2 vols. 1871. 20. 'Correspondence and Conversations of Alexis de Tocqueville with N. W. Senior,' 2 vols. 1871. 21. 'Conversations with M. Thiers, Guizot, and other distinguished Persons during the Second Empire,' 2 vols. 1878 (continues No. 19). 22. 'Conversations with distinguished Persons during the Second Empire from 1860 to 1863,' 2 vols. 1880 (continues No. 21). 23. 'Conversations and Journals in Egypt and Malta' (during a journey with the Suez Canal commission in 1855-6), 2 vols. 1882.

Senior contributed 'twelve school miseries' to the 'Miseries of Human Life,' by James Beresford [q. v.], a book praised by Scott in the 'Edinburgh Review' (Miscellaneous Works, xix, 139, &c.) To the journals may be added 'Louie Napoleon painted by a Contemporary' in the 'Cornhill Magazine' of May 1873.

[Information from Senior's daughter, Mrs. Simpson, and his grandson, Mr. Walter Nassau Senior. See also Bloxam's Register of the Dames of Magdalen College; an article in the Cornhill Magazine for August 1864 by Mrs. Richmond Ritchie; and many references in Ticknor's Life and Letters.]

L. S.

SENLIS or ST. LIZ, SIMON DE, EARL OF NORTHAMPTON AND HUNTINGDON (d. 1109), was son of a Norman noble called Randal le Ryche. According to the register of the priory of St. Andrew at Northampton (Monast. Angl. v. 190), he fought with his brother Garner for William the Conqueror at Hastings. But there is no mention of him in Domesday book, and it seems more probable that he did not come to England till about the end of the reign of William I (FREEMAN, Norman Conquest, iv. 604). According to the legends preserved in the pseudo-Ingulph and the 'Vita Waldevi,' Simon was given by the Conqueror the hand of Judith, the widow of Earl Waltheof of Huntingdon; but Judith refused to marry him on account of his lameness. Simon then received the earldom of Northampton and Huntingdon from the king, and eventually married Matilda or Maud, the daughter of Waltheof and Judith. The marriage is an undoubted fact, but probably must be placed, together with the grant of the earldoms, not earlier than 1089. According to the 'Vita Waldevi,' Simon went on the crusade in 1093, but he appears to have been fighting on the side of William Rufus in Normandy in 1098, when he was taken prisoner by Louis, son of the king of France (FREEMAN, William Rufus, ii. 190). He was also one of the witnesses to the coronation charter of Henry I in 1100 (STUBBS, Select Charters, p. 102). Afterwards he went on the crusade. He died in 1109, and was buried at the priory of La Charité-sur-Loire. Earl Simon built Northampton Castle, and founded the priory of St. Andrew, Northampton, according to tradition, about 1084, but more probably in 1108 (Monast. Angl. v. 190-1). By his wife, Matilda, Simon had two sons—Simon, who is noticed below, and Waltheof (d. 1159) [q. v.], who was abbot of Melrose. A daughter Maud married Robert FitzRichard of Tonbridge.

SIMON II DE SENLIS, EARL OF NORTHAMPTON (d. 1153), was a minor at his father's death. His mother married as her second husband David (1084-1153) [q. v.], afterwards king of Scotland. David obtained the earldom of Northampton in right of his wife and to the exclusion of his stepson. The young Simon witnessed the Oxford charter of King Stephen at Easter 1136, simply as Simon de Saintliz (STUBBS, Select Charters, p. 121). Stephen granted the earldom of Huntingdon to Simon's half-brother, Henry of Scotland (1114?-1152) [q. v.]. When Henry and his father gave their support to the Empress Matilda, Simon not unnaturally joined Stephen, who previously to 1141 restored him to the earldom of Northampton. Earl Simon fought for Stephen at Lincoln in 1141, and was one of the three earls who remained faithful to Queen Matilda during her husband's captivity. After the death of Henry of Scotland in 1162, Simon was rewarded for his loyalty by receiving the earldom of Huntingdon. He died in August 1168. He had been one of the foremost of Stephen's supporters, and his death, coinciding with that of the king's son Eustace, removed the two chief opponents to an agreement between the king and Henry FitzEmpress (Hæx. HUNT. p. 288). Henry of Huntingdon makes Robert of Gloucester describe Simon II as one whose acts never got beyond speeches, nor his gifts beyond promises (ib. p. 270). Simon II de Senlis founded the nunnery of De la Pré, near Northampton, and the abbey of Saltrey in Huntingdonshire. He married Isabel, daughter of Robert de Beaumont, earl of Leicester (ib. 1118), by whom he had a son, Simon. Simon III de Senlis was apparently recognised in the earldom of Northampton as soon as he came of age in 1159; he obtained the earldom of Huntingdon also on its forfeiture by William the Lion of Scotland in 1174. He married Alice, daughter and heiress of Gilbert de Gant, earl of Lincoln, but died without offspring in 1183 or 1184.

[Ordericus Vitalis, iii. 402, iv. 169, v. 130 (Soc. de l'Hist. de France); Henry of Huntingdon (Rolls Ser.); Vita et passio Waldevi ap. Chroniques Anglo-Normandes, vol. ii.; Dugdale's Monasticon Anglicanum, v. 178, 186, 190-1, 207, 521; Freeman's Norman Conquest and William Rufus; Round's Geoffrey de Mandeville; Dugdale's Baronage, i. 58; Doyle's Official Baronage, ii. 611-12; G. E. C. [okayne]'s Complete Peerage, iv. 262-4, vi. 67.] C. L. K.

SEPPINGS, SIR ROBERT (1767-1840), naval architect, born at Fakenham in Norfolk in 1767, was son of Robert Seppings and his wife Lydia, daughter of John Milligen, a linen draper at Harleston. Sir Robert's birthplace is eight miles from Burnham Thorpe, where Nelson was born in 1758. His father was a cattle salesman, but his business did not prosper, and Seppings in his boyhood had to contribute to the family's income by carrying letters to a neighbouring town on a mule. Subsequently his mother's brother, John Milligen, a retired naval captain who had settled at Plymouth, adopted, in the place of children of his own, his nephew Robert, as well as the two daughters of his brother, Thomas Milligen. One of these, Charlotte, became Seppings's wife, while her sister Martha married Richard

(afterwards Vice-admiral Sir Richard) Dacres, G.C.H., and her sons became Admiral Sir Sidney Colpoys Dacres [q. v.] and Field-Marshal Sir Richard James Dacres [q. v.]

In 1782 Captain Milligen apprenticed his nephew Robert, then fifteen years old, as a working shipwright in Plymouth dockyard. His education was very limited at the time, and his knowledge of mathematics was always slender; but he rapidly acquired a deep interest in his profession, and displayed an inventive genius which industry, determination, and the rapidity and accuracy of his powers of observation enabled him to turn to practical uses.

His first important invention may be referred to 1800. He was then master shipwright assistant at Plymouth dockyard. His chief work was to shore and lift ships in dock, and he was impressed by the time wasted in the processes employed. He sought a method by which ships might be suspended instead of lifted, and with this end in view, after experimenting with models in his cabin on the dock, he constructed new machinery, formerly called 'Seppings blocks.' By an arrangement of three wedges—two being placed vertically beside the ship, and one set horizontally across the other two—the examination of the keels and lower timbers of vessels was accomplished with comparative ease and rapidity. Where the old system needed the services of five hundred men, Seppings's system required but twenty men and two-thirds of the time formerly required. A vessel could, in fact, be docked and undocked by means of Seppings's blocks in one spring tide. A trial of the blocks was first made at Plymouth dockyard in September 1800, on the large Spanish first-rate San Josef. A dock at Plymouth was first fitted up with the blocks in 1801 by order of the navy board. For this invention Seppings was granted 1,000*l.* by the admiralty, and the Copley medal on 23 Nov. 1803 by the Society of Arts. In the 'Proceedings' of that society, vol. xxii., is a detailed account of the system of blocks, with diagrams.

Although the admiralty habitually discouraged innovation, Sir John Henslowe, the surveyor of the navy, was in full sympathy with Seppings's efforts. Owing doubtless to his representations, the navy board, in defiance of its traditions, gave practical proof of their appreciation of Seppings's ingenuity by at once removing him to Chatham, and by making him in 1804 a master shipwright. Meanwhile, Seppings had begun another series of experiments on the construction of ships, which resulted in his invention of the system of diagonally bracing and trussing the frame-timbers, an invention of the first importance in shipbuilding. Hitherto, ships of the first class had suffered from the arching of their keels, technically called 'hogging.' This arose from the irregularity of the weight occasioned by greater upward pressure in the centre than in the extremities. When a first-rate ship entered the sea, she was usually found to have dropped two to five or six inches at head and stern. To prevent this result Seppings suggested that the frame-timbers should not, as had previously been done, be merely placed square and rectangular to each other, but that they should be braced together by trusses laid diagonally, and forming a series of triangles. While at Plymouth in 1800 Seppings had experimented in this direction on the Glenmore, an old and weak vessel of 80 guns. His success induced him, on his promotion to Chatham, to extend his operations in 1805 to the Kent, 74 guns, when docked for repairs. The plan answered all his expectations, and in 1810 it was applied with excellent effect to the old Tremendous (74). The Howe, launched on 28 March 1815, was the first ship laid down and wholly built on the diagonal principle. The system met with bitter opposition from the older shipwrights; it was pronounced to be 'without sense or science,' but Sir John Barrow [q. v.], second secretary of the admiralty, regarded it with favour, and described its merits in an article in the 'Quarterly Review.' Barrow induced Charles Yorke, first lord of the admiralty, to direct its adoption in the government shipyards. Seppings fully and clearly explained the new system in a paper read before the Royal Society on 10 March 1814, and supplied a print of a section indicating the arrangements in detail. He showed how a barred gate was stiffened by fixing across it a diagonal strip of wood, and proved that the diagonal braces and trusses placed on either side of the ship, with cross-bracing between the port-holes, and the attachment of the beams to the sides of the vessel by small timbers, rendered the ship one mass, and attained the essential qualities of 'strength, safety, and durability.' In conclusion, Seppings acknowledged the honourable spirit of liberality which dictated 'the orders for carrying out this new principle of constructing his majesty's ships.' A second paper, read before the Royal Society on 27 Nov. 1817 (Transactions, 1818), showed the success of the principle on its trial on the Howe (120), the St. Vincent (120), and the Justitia (74), an old Danish ship. Critics of 'high mathematical talents, who generally approved of the system' (KNOWLES, Principles, &c., p. 12), controverted some of its details; but Seppings, who had no mathematical training, proved them in the wrong by actual experiment.

A third invention by Seppings was suggested by the loss of life on the Victory (100) at the battle of Trafalgar, owing to shot passing unimpeded through the boarding of the beakhead. In 1807 Seppings recommended the replacement of the beakhead of the ship by timbers run up the sides forming a circular bow. Subsequently he introduced a round stern, which became a formidable battery.

On 14 June 1813 Seppings was appointed by patent (Admiralty Bill Office Registry of Salaries) to the office of surveyor of the navy, and was elected a fellow of the Royal Society on 10 March 1814. He received the honour of knighthood on 17 Aug. 1819 on board the Royal George yacht 'under sail, the royal standard flying' (Heralds' College). He received many other marks of honour at home and abroad. The Emperor Alexander of Russia, the king of Denmark and Holland, all presented him with valuable gifts to mark their appreciation of his professional services. In 1838 the university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of D.C.L.

When, in 1832, Sir James Graham [q. v.], first lord of the admiralty, began a reform of the naval administration, Seppings resigned, on 12 June 1832, after nearly fifty years' service, his successor, Sir William Symonds, being appointed by warrant on 13 June 1832. After his retirement from Chatham, Seppings settled at Taunton, Somerset, where he died on 25 Sept. 1840. A small tablet in the chancel of St. Mary's there is inscribed with a brief record of his career.

By his innovations Seppings rendered ships in every way more seaworthy and better adapted for defence. In the museum of the Royal United Service Institution there is a fine model of a vessel presented by Seppings to the board of admiralty, which opens lengthwise, showing in opposite sections the two halves of a ship, the one with the old construction, the other with Seppings's improvements and inventions. His improved methods of shipbuilding are now universally adopted in all ships, whether constructed for the navy or the merchant service. In 1891, at the Naval Exhibition at Chelsea, the gallery in which models illustrating the progress of naval architecture were shown, was entitled the 'Seppings' gallery.

Lady Seppings died at Taunton on 22 Nov. 1834. Seppings's eldest son, John Milligen Seppings, filled for twenty years the office of inspector of shipping under the East India Company at Calcutta; with the death of his only surviving child (a daughter), the family in the male line became extinct. Another of Sir Robert's sons, Captain Edward Seppings, with his wife and two children, was killed at Cawnpore during the mutiny.

[Principles and Practice of Constructing Ships as mentioned and introduced by Sir Robert Seppings, by John Knowles, F.R.S., 1822; Gent. Mag. 1840, ii. 97; Philosophical Transactions, 1814, 1818; Proceedings of the Society of Arts, vol. xxii.; English Cyclopædia; Penny Cyclopædia, s.v. 'Shipbuilding'; The British Fleet, by Commander N. Robinson, R.N.; Statement of Cases of Mr. Robert Seppings as to the Invention for obviating lifting Ships, Chatham, 1804; James's Naval History, ed. 1826.]

E. M. B.

SERES, WILLIAM (d. 1679?), printer, is said by Ames to have been in partnership with John Day (1522-1584) [q. v.] as a printer as early as 1514, but the earliest known book published by Seres is dated 1548. He also printed in connection with Anthony Scoloker [q. v.] and William Hill. Day and Seres separated about 1550, and the latter established himself at 'St. Peter College' in St. Paul's Churchyard. When that building was occupied by the Stationers' Company, Seres set up at the sign of the 'Hedge Hog' at the west end of St. Paul's Churchyard. The use of this device—the badge of Sir Henry Sidney—has led to the assumption that Seres was Sidney's servant. It is more probable that he was in the service of Cecil, who on 11 March 1553-4 procured for him a patent to be sole printer of all primers (i.e. forms of private prayer) and psalters. On the accession of Mary, Seres, who had published a large number of protestant books, was deprived of his patent and thrown into prison (Egerton Papers, Camden Soc., p. 140). Elizabeth, however, renewed the patent, including in it Seres's wife and son. Subsequently Seres parted with some of his rights to Henry Denham, and this led to a protracted dispute between Denham and Seres's widow (AMES, ed. Dibdin, iv. 194-5; TIMPERLEY, Typogr. Encycl. pp. 362-8). Seres took an active part in the affairs of the Stationers' Company; he was a member of the old company existing before the charter of 1556; in the new company he was master five times, namely, in 1570, 1571, 1575-6-7; he was also a generous benefactor to the company. He died between March 1577-8 (ARBER, ii. 676) and June 1580 (ib. ii. 682). The business was carried on under the name of his son, William Seres, junior, until 1603.

Dibdin enumerates more than sixty works printed by Seres between 1548 and 1577. Among the more important were Sir John Cheke's 'Hurt of Sedition,' 1549 and again in 1569, and Sir Geoffrey Fenton's 'Monophylo,' 1572. In 1562 he published a verse translation of 'A Prayer,' by himself, and apparently he was also author of an 'Answer to the Proclamation of the Rebels in the North,' 1569, in verse (MAYLAND, Index of English Books at Lambeth, p. 98; AMES, ed. Dibdin, iv. 216; Notes and Queries, 8th ser. viii. 345). He must be distinguished from one William Seres, a Scot, who 'departed out of Scotland because he had stolen away the sheriff of Linlithgow's wife, the Lord Semple's daughter; after that he was three years in Almain's with the Palsgrave and the emperor; then with others he came by a ship and was taken in Brittany and condemned to the galleys' (Cal. State Papers, For. Ser. 1566-8, No. 183). Having been released, he was actively concerned in the rebellion of 1569, and afterwards lived abroad (MURDIN, Burghley State Papers, pp. 215-7; Hatfield MSS. ii. 17, 26; Notes and Queries, 8th ser. viii. 345).

[Arber's Transcript of the Stationers' Reg. passim; Ames's Typogr. Antig. ed. Herbert, pp. 686, 705, ed. Dibdin, iv. 193, 226; Timperley's Encycl. pp. 362-3; Cal. State Papers, For. Ser. 1563, Nos. 1414, 1461, 1531; Archæologia, xxv. 108; Egerton Papers (Camden Soc.), pp. 138, 143; Strype's Works, index, passim; Corser's Collect. Anglo-Poet.; Hazlitt's Handbook and Collections, passim; Notes and Queries, 8th ser. viii. 345.]

A. F. P.

SERGEANT. [See also SARGENT.]

SERGEANT, JOHN (1622-1707), Roman catholic controversialist, son of William Sergeant, yeoman, of Barrow-upon-Humber, Lincolnshire, was born there in 1622, and educated in a private school kept by Mr. Rawson in the neighbouring village of Barton. He was admitted a sub-sizar of St. John's College, Cambridge, on 12 April 1639. In 1641 he contributed verses to the university collection of poems on the king's return from Scotland, and in 1642-3 he graduated B.A. He became secretary to Thomas Morton, bishop of Durham, upon the recommendation of Dr. William Beale [q. v.], master of St. John's. This position he held for about a year, during which time he was employed in transcribing quotations from the ancient fathers. His researches in early ecclesiastical history resulted in his conversion to the Roman catholic church. Afterwards retiring to the English College at Lisbon, he went through a course of theology and was ordained priest.

For some time he was prefect of studies, and in 1652 he was sent on the English mission. His brethren soon after his arrival made him a canon and secretary of their chapter. Finding him well skilled in controversial writing, they encouraged him to undertake the defence of the catholic cause, and this he did with remarkable assiduity for upwards of forty years. He was, indeed, the 'very genius of controversy,' and there was no great protestant writer of his time that he did not encounter. In his 'Literary Life,' written in 1700, he states that he had printed thirty-two books at a cost of over 800*l.*, which sum he paid out of his own earnings, without burdening catholics or any of his brethren (Catholicon, iii. 127). In 1675 he was at Rouen, where he became well acquainted with the Abbé Walter Montagu (q. v.), and during his residence in France he lived on terms of intimacy with Bossuet, to whom he dedicated his 'Methodus Compendiosa.' In 1688 he was engaged in the composition of a second answer to Tillotson's 'Rule of Faith,' and seven sheets of it had been struck off by Bennet, the catholic printer, when the mob, rising at the Revolution, plundered the press, seized all the printed sheets, and took away some of the 'copy.' For two years after this Sergeant had enough to do to provide for his own safety, passing himself off as a physician and assuming at different times the names of Dodd, Holland, and Smith. 'He was unmanageable all his life,' observes one of his friends, Sylvester Jenks, in his unpublished letters to another of Sergeant's friends, Father Fairfax, 'and ended his days with printing libels, in which he abused, not only me, but many of my betters in a much more scurrilous manner than ever he did you or yours.' He died, 'with a pen in his hand,' in 1707.

Charles Flowden remarks that Sergeant was 'the author of a system of controversy entirely grounded on the erroneous principles of Blackloe [i.e. Thomas White (1582-1676), q. v.], which he published in a book entitled "Sure Footing." This book was attacked by catholic and protestant divines, especially by Dr. Peter Talbot, catholic archbishop of Dublin; and it was defended in various tracts by the author. He seems to have possessed a small share of ill-digested knowledge, much presumption, and an ardent temper, suited to the genius of faction and party. He was closely connected, in friendship and error, with Blackloe, and also with . . . Hobbes. Among the catholics he was usually called "Blackloe's Philip," in allusion to the secondary part which Philip Melancthon acted under Luther' (Remarks on the Memoirs of Gregorio Panzani, 1794, p. 285). An account of Sergeant's theological opinions is given in Peter Talbot's 'Blackloane Heresia . . . Historia et Confutatio,' 1675, 4to, published under Talbot's pseudonym, 'Lominus' [see TALBOT, PETER]. He must doubtless be distinguished from the John Sergeant whose evidence with regard to Oates's plot was printed by order of the House of Commons, 1681, fol.

The controversialist's works are: 1. English verse addressed 'To Sir Kenelm Digby upon his two incomparable Treatises of Philosophy' [London, 1653], 4to. 2. 'Schism disarm'd of the Defensive Weapons lent it by Doctor Hammond and the Bishop of Derry,' Paris, 1655, 8vo. 3. 'Schism Dispatch, or a Liejoynder to the Replies of Dr. Hammond and the Ld. of Derry' [J. Bramhall], [Paris?], 1657, 8vo. 4. 'Reflections upon the Oath of Supremacy and Allegiance. By a Catholic Gentleman,' 1661, 12mo (cf. BUTLER, Historical Memoirs, iii. 480). 5. 'An Answer to Dr. Pierce's Sermon' [on Matthew, xix. 8], n. p., 1663, 8vo. 6. 'Sure Footing in Christianity, or Rational Discourses on the Rule of Faith. With three short Animadversions on Dr. Pierce's Sermon; also on some Passages in Mr. Whitby and Mr. Stillingfleet which concern that Rule. By J. S.,' London, 1665, 8vo; a second edition appeared the same year with 'an appendix, subverting fundamentally and manifoldly my Ld. of Down's [i.e. Jeremy Taylor's] Dissuasive,' and a 'Letter to Dr. Casaubon.' 7. 'A Discovery of the Groundlessness and Insincerity of my Ld. of Down's Dissuasive. Being the Fourth Appendix to Sure-Footing. With a Letter to Dr. Casaubon, and another to his Answerer. By J. S.,' London, 1665, 8vo. 8. 'Let Common Reason be Judge,' a treatise on the use of holy images in answer to B. Horwood [1665?]. 9. 'Sober Advice to Mr. Gataker' [1666?]. 10. 'The Solid Grounds of the Roman Catholic Faith,' in answer to Dr. Matthew Poole's 'Nullity of the Romish Faith,' Oxford, 1666, 8vo. 11. 'A Letter of Thanks from the Author of Sure-Footing to his Answerer, Mr. J. Tillotson,' Paris, 1666, 8vo. 12. 'Faith vindicated from Possibility of Falshood' [anon.], Louvain, 1667, 8vo. 13. 'The Method to arrive at Satisfaction in Religion' (anon.) [1671], 12mo. 14. 'Error nonplust; or, Dr. Stillingfleet shown to be the Man of no Principles. With an Essay how Discourses concerning Catholick Grounds bear the Highest Evidence' (anon.), 1673, 8vo. 15. 'Methodus compendiosa qua recto pervestigatur et certo invenitur Fides Christiana,' Paris, 1674, 12mo; dedicated to Bossuet. 16. 'Clypeus Septemplex. Declaratio

- D. Sergeantii circa doctrinam in libris suis contentam exhibita Sacre Congregationi... Cardinalium in universa Christiana Republica contra hæreticam pravitatem Generalem Inquisitorum: appendix seu quærimonia J. Sergeantii adversus M. Lominum [i.e. Peter Talbot, catholic archbishop of Dublin] ... Douay, 1677, 8vo. 17. 'Vindiciæ J. Sergeantii tribunalibus Romano et Parisiensi, ubi ab illis P. Talboto ... de doctrina prava accusatus fuit, in librorum suorum defensionem exhibitæ' [Douay], 1678, 8vo. 18. 'A Letter to the D[ean] of P. [St. Paul's, i.e. Dr. E. Stillingfleet] in Answer to the arguing part of his first Letter to Mr. G[oddin]' (anon.) London, 1687, 4to; a reply to this was published anonymously by Clement Ellis, M.A. 19. 'A Second Catholic Letter; or, Reflections on the Reflector [Clement Ellis]'s Defence of Dr. Stillingfleet's First Letter to Mr. G[oddin] against the Answer to the arguing part of it' (anon.), London, 1687, 4to. 20. 'A Third Catholic Letter in answer to the arguing Part of Dr. Stillingfleet's Second Letter' (anon.), London, 1687, 4to. 21. 'The Fourth Catholic Letter in answer to Dr. Stillingfleet's Sermon preach'd at Guild-hall, Nov. 27, 1687, entitled Scripture & Tradition compared; address to his Auditor,' London, 1688, 4to. 22. 'The Fifth Catholic Letter in reply to Dr. Stillingfleet's (pretended) Answer to about the Fortieth Part of J. S.'s Catholic Letters, address to all impartial Readers,' London, 1688, 4to. 23. 'A Letter to [William Wake] the Continuator of the Present State of our Controversy. Laying open the Folly of his extravagant Boasting, and the Malice of his Willful Forgeries' [1688?] 24. 'The Sixth Catholic Letter, laying open the Folly of the Continuator's extravagant Boasting, and the Malice of his wilful Forgeries. In which also the Accounts between J. S.'s two Adversaries, Dr. Stillingfleet and Dr. Tillotson, are cast up' [London, 1688], 4to. 25. 'The Schism of the Church of England, &c. demonstrated in four Arguments. Formerly propos'd to Dr. Gunning and Dr. Pearson, the late Bishops of Ely and Chester, by two Catholic Disputants in a celebrated Conference upon that Point' (anon.), Oxford, 1688, 4to. 26. 'A second answer to Tillotson's 'Rule of Faith,' London, 1688, 8vo, partly printed but never published. 27. 'The Method to Science. By J. S., London, 1696, 8vo. 28. 'Solid Philosophy asserted against the Fancies of the Ideists: or the Method to Science farther illustrated. With Reflexions on Mr. Locke's Essay concerning Human Understanding. By J. S., London, 1697, 8vo. Mr. James Crossley, F.S.A., says: 'I have Locke's copy of Sergeant's 'Solid Philosophy asserted,' the margins of which are filled with answers in Locke's autograph to the animadversions contained in that book. It is somewhat strange that neither these nor his manuscript notes on the pamphlets of Thomas Burnett of the Charterhouse, written against the "Essay on the Human Understanding," which are also in my possession, have ever been published or noticed by his biographers' (WORTHINGTON, Diary, ii. 193 n.) 29. 'Railery defeated by calm Reasoning,' London, 1689, 12mo. 30. 'Transnatural Philosophy, or Mystaphysicks: demonstrating the Essences and Operations of all Beings whatever, which gives the Principles to all other Sciences. And shewing the perfect Conformity of Christian Faith to Right Reason, and the Unreasonableness of Atheists, Deists, Antitrinitarians, and other Sectaries. By J. S., London, 1700, 8vo; 2nd edit. London, 1706, 8vo. 31. 'The Literary Life of John Sergeant. Written by Himself in Paris, 1700, at the Request of the Duke of Perth,' London, 1816, 8vo, edited by John Kirk, D.D. 32. 'An Account of the Chapter erected by William [Bishop] titular Bishop of Chalcedon, and Ordinary of England and Scotland,' 16mo; reprinted, with preface and notes by William Barclay Turnbull, London, 1853, 8vo. 33. 'Transactions relating to the English Secular Clergy,' 1706. 34. 'The Jesuit's Gospel,' a pamphlet which was repudiated by the whole of the catholic clergy (GILLow, iii. 619). 'Schism Unmask'd,' 1658, is ascribed to Sergeant by Dolman, but the real author was the jesuit father, John Percy (cf. JONES, Papery Tracts).
- Among those who published replies to works by Sergeant were Hammond, Bramhall, Pierce, Casaubon, Taylor, Stillingfleet, Whitby, Tillotson, Wilkins, Poole, Gataker, W. Falkner, Clement Ellis, and George Hughes.
- [Addit. MS. 5880, f. 189; Birch's Life of Tillotson, pp. 33, 34, 36, 371, 409; Bodleian Cat.; Bonney's Life of Jeremy Taylor, p. 349; Bramhall's Works (1842), Life, pp. xxviii, xxix, vol. ii. p. 358 n.; Catholicicon (1816), ii. 129-36, 169-176, 217-24, iii. 9-16, 55-64, 97-104, 131-7, 248; Commons' Journals, ix. 710, 711; Dodd's Church Hist. iii. 472; Foulle's Romish Treasons and Usurpations, pref. p. vii; Gillow's Bibl. Dict. iv. 49; Halkett and Laing's Dict. of Anonymous Lit.; Pref. to Hickes's Devotions in the Ancient Way of Offices, 2nd edit. 1701; Jones's Papery Tracts, p. 484; Panzani's Memoirs, pp. xiv, 93 n. 326 n. 382, 384; Sergeant's Literary Life, 1816; Watt's Bibl. Brit.; Wood's Athenæ Oxon. (Bliss), iii. 496, iv. 1063, 1053.] T. C.

SERGISON, CHARLES (1654-1732), commissioner of the navy, born in 1654, entered the service of the crown as a dockyard clerk in July 1671. In 1676 he became clerk to the clerk of the acts, whose office was then held jointly by Thomas Hayter and John Pepys, a younger brother of Samuel Pepys [q. v.]. John Pepys died in 1677 and was succeeded by James Sothorne, who, after March 1680, held the office by himself till 25 Dec. 1680. Sergison was then appointed in Sothorne's room, and remained clerk of the acts for thirty years, for the most part single-handed, but from 1701 to 1706 jointly with Samuel Atkins, formerly clerk of Samuel Pepys. During this period, which included the war of the Spanish succession, as well as the little war of 1718, the work of the navy board was excessively heavy, and Sergison won the highest opinion of the several administrations with whom he acted. The emoluments of the office were large, though rather by perquisites and fees than by pay, and in 1691 Sergison was able to purchase Cuckfield Park in Sussex. During the reign of Anne he more than once asked for permission to retire, but was told that he could not be spared. Afterwards, when he was superseded at the age of 65, in 1719, he seems to have felt it as an undeserved insult. During the rest of his life he lived at Cuckfield Place, and there he died on 20 Nov. 1732. He was buried in Cuckfield church, where there is a tablet to his memory. Sergison married Anne, daughter of Mr. Crawley of the navy office; she predeceased him; and on his death without children the estate passed to his grand-nephew, Thomas Warden, who took the name of Sergison. He also died, leaving no children, and was succeeded by his brother Michael, who assumed the name of Sergison. In his family the estate still remains.

Sergison formed a large collection of manuscripts relating to the navy; and though many of these have been dispersed, many are still at Cuckfield Place. He had also a fine collection of models, which has been preserved entire and in beautiful condition.

[Sussex Archaeological Collections, xxv. 62-84; Duckett's Naval Commissioners.]

J. K. L.

SERLE, AMBROSE (1742-1812), Calvinistic writer, was born on 30 Aug. 1742, and entered the navy, in which by 1795 he had attained the rank of captain (Ann. Reg.) When William Legge, second earl of Dartmouth [q. v.], became secretary of state for the colonies in 1772, Serle was appointed one of his under-secretaries, and in January 1776 he was made clerk of reports. He went to America in 1774, accompanied the British army from 1776 to 1778, and during part of that time had control of the press in New York. His knowledge of American affairs was considerable, and his letters throw much light upon the course of events (cf. Hist. MSS. Comm. 14th Rep. App. x. passim). On returning from America in 1780 he settled at Heckfield, Hampshire. In 1795 the latter was a commissioner of 'the transport service and the care of prisoners of war,' and was re-appointed in 1803 and 1809. He died on 1 Aug. 1812, and was buried in the churchyard at Broadwater, near Worthing. He was married, and a daughter Jane (1780-1792) was Mrs. Romaine's goddaughter.

In 1704, while living in or near London, Serle became a friend of William Romaine [q. v.]. Other friends were John Thornton, John Newton, Toplady, and Leigh Richmond. Soon after 1780 he published his 'Hore Solitariae' (2nd edit. 1787) and the 'Christian Remembrancer' (1787). A series of letters from Romaine (Works, vol. viii.) shows the deep affection and entire accord in religious matters which subsisted between him and Serle. Nowhere does the conviction of the vital importance of Calvinism as of the essence of the gospel appear more strongly than in Serle's books. The 'Hore Solitariae' and the 'Christian Remembrancer' passed through many editions. Romaine circulated them broadcast. Other works by Serle are: 1. 'Christian Husbandry,' 1789. 2. 'The Christian Parent,' 1793, often reprinted. 3. 'Charis,' 1803. 4. 'The Secret Thoughts of a departed Friend,' written while the author was suffering from paralysis in 1812, and designed for posthumous publication, 1818. 5. 'The Church of God,' 1814.

[Gent. Mag. 1812, ii. 193; Life of Hannah More, 1835, passim; Serle's Works; Brit. Mus. Cat.] II. L. B.

SERLO, called GRAMMATICUS (1109-1207?), monk of Fountains, born in 1109, was brother of Ralph, abbot of Louth Park in Lincolnshire. Though he was present when the monks of St. Mary's, York, left that house to found the abbey at Fountains, and was related to some of them, he did not himself enter Fountains till 1138, when he was twenty-nine (WALBRAN, Memorials of Fountains, I. viii. 57; but cf. LELAND, De Script. Brit. i. 159; and PRIS, De Illustr. Angl. Script. p. 223). From Fountains he was sent in 1147 to assist in founding Kirkstall, near Leeds, where he spent the rest of his long life. It was Serlo who in his ninety-ninth year gave Hugh of Kirkstall the information which he worked up into his 'Narratio de fundatione Fontanie Monasterii in comitatu Eboracensi' (Memorials of Fountains, vol. i.) Serlo's daily lectures to his pupils are said to have been the origin of his books. He probably died at Kirkstall about 1207.

Serlo is said to have written 'De bello inter Scotiam Regem et Angliam Barones,' a Latin poem printed by Twysden (Decem Scriptores, i. 331). Other works attributed doubtfully to him are 'De Morte Sumerledi,' 'De Dictionibus Disyllabis,' 'De Dictionibus equivocis,' 'De Dictionibus univocis' (BALD, Script. Illust. Brit. i. 108), and 'De Differentiis Verborum' (PITS, l.c. p. 224). Several of these are extant in manuscript in different college libraries in Cambridge.

It is difficult, however, to distinguish the writings of Serlo of Fountains from those of three other men of the same name (HARDY, Descriptive Catalogue, vol. ii. Rolls Ser.) The first SERLO (fl. 960?) probably lived about the middle of the tenth century, and was a Benedictine of St. Augustine's, Canterbury. After a feud with monks of another house in that city, he wrote with great bitterness against monks in general a book called 'Monachorum Libidines' (BALD, l.c. i. 136). He is said to have been bishop of Cornwall, but his name does not appear among those of the bishop of that diocese (PITS, l.c. p. 175, but see STRONG, Regist. Sacr. Angl. p. 167). Other works doubtfully attributed to him are five books of commentaries on the Pentateuch, a treatise 'de proverbiiis,' and a book of homilies (PITS, l.c.)

The second, SERLO OF BAYEUX (1036?-1104), a Norman by birth, was perhaps at different times canon of Bayeux and of Avranches, monk of Mount St. Michael in Normandy, and chaplain to William, afterwards the conqueror of England (Hist. et Cart. Monast. Gloucestr. i. 10, Rolls Ser.) His patron was Odo [q.v.], bishop of Bayeux, half-brother of William, and, at the suggestion of Osmund, the chancellor, the king gave him the abbey of Gloucester, 29 Aug. 1072 (Cart. Monast. Gloucestr. l.c.) At the time of Serlo's appointment there were only two monks of full age in the house, but under his vigorous administration its prosperity was firmly established, and the number of monks raised to over a hundred (WILL. MALM, Gesta Regum, ii. 512, Rolls Ser.; DUGDALE, Monast. Angl. i. 531-2; cf. Cartul. Monast. Gloucestr. i. 58 seq.) Serlo rebuilt the abbey church and had it consecrated in 1100 (ib. pp. 11-12), but it appears to have been destroyed by fire shortly after. Serlo was a man of strong will and high personal character, and, after thirty-two years of able rule, died on 8 March 1104 (ib. p. 13; SYM. DUNELM. ii. 236). Aa epitaph upon him written by Godfrey of Winchester [q.v.], is extant (Cartul. Gloucestr. p. 18). To disentangle Serlo's writing and especially his verse from that of his friend, Godfrey of Winchester, seems impossible (Descriptive Cat. ii. 58, 60, 74, 97, &c.), but he perhaps wrote the treatise 'Super Oratione Dominica,' sometimes attributed to Serlo of Fountains (TANNER, Bibl. Brit.-Hib. p. 662 n.) There is also extant a letter which he wrote to William Rufus, informing him of a dream of one of his monks concerning the king's approaching death (ORD. VIT. x. 781).

The third SERLO (d. 1147), called the Priest, lived under Henry I., and was the son of Syred the Smith and Leofleda (Cartul. Gloucestr. i. 81; TANNER, l.c.; BALD, l.c.) He was fourth dean of Salisbury, in what year is not known (LE NEVE, Fasti Eccl. Angl. ii. 612), and was first abbot of Cirencester in 1117 (FLOD. WIG. ii. 92, Engl. Hist. Soc.; Monast. Angl. vi. 176). Serlo and his mother sold their land in Gloucester to the abbey of St. Peter's in 1129, his son Bartholomew being a witness to the transaction (Cartul. Gloucestr. i. 812). Serlo died at Cirencester in 1147.

[Authorities cited in the text.] A. M. C.-M.

SERMON, WILLIAM (1629?-1679), physician, born probably in 1629, was 'nearly related' to one Edmond Sermon, a native of Naunton-Beauchamp, Worcestershire. He seems to have gained his first medical experience 'in the armies.' About April 1666 his 'occasions' called him to Bristol, 'and the physicians there leaving the city,' owing to the plague, he was, by desire of the mayor, 'shut up at the Mermaid Tavern upon the Back, and after that at Mr. Richard Winston's house in the county of Gloucester, near the city aforesaid, in which infected houses,' he says, 'I continued the space of three months, and cured all of the Pest that took my Directions.' He now obtained 'a sufficient practice upon the worst of diseases,' and remained at Bristol till 8 June 1669, when he was summoned to Newhall in Essex to attend George Monck, duke of Albemarle [q.v.], for dropsy. On 12 July Monck gave him a certificate of his cure, and Charles II., on 6 Aug., sent letters to the university of Cambridge requesting them to grant Sermon a medical degree (Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1669, October to December, p. 441). In 1670 he accordingly graduated M.D.

On 9 Sept. 1669 an advertisement appeared in the 'London Gazette,' stating that Sermon had 'removed from Bristol, and may be seen at his house in West Harding Street, in Goldsmith's Rents, near Three-legged Alley, between Fetter Lane and Shoe Lane' (ib. p. 486). He now gained a considerable practice, and was made physician-in-ordinary to the king. In 1672 appeared the eighth edition of his 'Advertisement concerning those most famous and safe cathartiques and diuretique Pills . . . wherewith was cured the late Lord-general Monck of the Dropsie.' Sermon denies that Monck 'eventually died of the dropsy, 'as many enviously report' (cf. GUMBEL, Life of Monck, pp. 246, 254, 476). Much of the book is repeated in 'The Ladies Companion, or the English Midwife' (1671, 8vo), which is illustrated with sixteen copper cuts, giving 'the various forms of the child's proceeding forth of the womb.' The author complains of 'the great rage of black-mouth'd envy' excited by his success. A third work, issued in 1673, was 'A Friend to the Sick, or the honest English Man's preservative . . . with a particular discourse of the Dropsie, sourvie, and yellow jaundice.' Prefixed to it are some Latin hexameters by P[ayne] Fisher [q. v.], and some English laudatory verses by various friends, including William Winstanley [q. v.]

Sermon died at his house in the parish of St. Bride's, London, in the winter of 1679. A portrait of him, drawn and engraved by William Sherwin [q. v.] in 1671, represents him in a doctor's gown at the age of forty-two. Under it are some doggerel lines, referring to his cure of Monck. It is prefixed to both 'The Ladies Companion' and the 'Friend to the Sick.' Wood calls him 'that forward, vain, and conceited person.'

[Sermon's Works; Wood's Fasti Oxon. ed. Bliss, ii. 364; Foster's Alumni Oxon.; Grad. Cant.; Granger's Biogr. Hist. of England, iv. 5.] G. L. G. N.

SERRES, DOMINIO (1722-1793), marine-painter, was born in 1722 at Auch in Gascony, and was educated in the public school there. He is said to have been nephew of the archbishop of Rheims. His parents intended him for the church, but, this not suiting his taste, he ran away from his native town, and made his way on foot into Spain. He there shipped on board a vessel for South America as a common sailor, and eventually became master of a trading vessel to the Havannah, where he was taken prisoner by a British frigate and brought to this country about 1758. After his release he married and lived for a time in Northamptonshire. He had received some instruction in drawing, and commenced life in England as a painter of naval pieces, for which the wars of the period furnished abundance of subjects. He received some assistance from Charles Brooking [q. v.], and soon established a position. In 1765 Serres became a member of the Incorporated Society of Artists, and exhibited with them for two years. On the establishment of the Royal Academy in 1768 he was chosen one of the foundation members, and was a constant contributor up to the time of his death. Between 1761 and 1793 he exhibited eight works at the Society of Artists, twenty-one at the Free Society, and 105 at the Royal Academy. Among the latter were 'The Siege at Fort Royal, Martinique' (1769), 'The Royal George returning from the Bay' (1771), 'The Burning of the Town of Gibralt' (1772), 'The Thésée sinking while engaging with the Torbay' (1777), and 'The Engagement between the Serapie and the Countess of Scarborough with Paul Jones and his Squadron' (1780). Serres was a good linguist. In 1792 he succeeded Wilton as librarian to the academy. He was also appointed marine-painter to George III, but he did not long hold these offices. He died in 1793, and was buried at St. Marylebone Old Church. He married about 1768, and left two sons, who followed his profession, John Thomas [q. v.] and Dominio, and four daughters, two of whom were honorary exhibitors at the Royal Academy. Paul Sandby was his friend and next-door neighbour.

There are several large sea-pieces by Serres (in bad condition) at Greenwich Hospital and at Hampton Court Palace; they do not sustain the reputation he enjoyed in his lifetime. A few of his water-colour drawings are at South Kensington Museum.

[Redgrave's Dict.; Edwards's Anecdotes; William Sandby's Thomas and Paul Sandby; Redgrave's Century; Graves's (Algernon) Dict.; Memoir of J. T. Serres, 1826, p. 7.] C. M.

SERRES, JOHN THOMAS (1759-1825), marine-painter, elder son of Dominio Serres [q. v.], was born in December 1759, and followed his father's profession. He was for some time drawing-master to a marine school at Chelsea. In 1780 he began to exhibit at the Royal Academy, sending two water-colour views and a painting of Sir George Rodney engaging the Spanish squadron. In 1790 he went to Italy, visiting Paris, Lyons, Marseilles, Genoa, Pisa, Florence, and Rome, where he passed five months, and then proceeded to Naples. After an absence of a little more than a year, he was recalled to England by a letter from Miss Olive Wilmot, the daughter of a house-painter at Warwick, to whom he had engaged himself before he left England, and whom he married, against the wishes of his friends, 17 Sept. 1791 [see SERRES, Mrs. OLIVIA].

In 1793 he succeeded his father as marine-painter to the king, and was also appointed marine draughtsman to the admiralty. In this latter capacity he was frequently employed in making sketches of the harbours on the enemy's coast, and had a vessel appointed for his services, receiving 100*l.* a month when on duty. He also contributed regularly (chiefly shipping and marine subjects) to the exhibitions of the Royal Academy till 1808. In 1801 he published a translation of 'The Little Sea-torch,' a guide for coasting ships, illustrated by a large number of coloured aquatints, and in 1805 his 'Liber Nauticus,' or instructor in the art of marine-drawing.

He saved a good deal of money, but was ruined by the intrigues and extravagance of his wife. He was separated from her (by deed) in 1804, and in 1808 went to Edinburgh to escape the persecutions to which he was still subjected from her, ceasing to contribute to the Royal Academy for seven years. But it was of no avail; he was arrested and thrown into prison, and, the same round of persecutions continuing, he was driven to make an attempt at suicide, which was happily frustrated. The failure of the speculation for building the Coburg Theatre, in which he had invested 2,000*l.* of his savings, obliged him to take advantage of the Insolvent Act. He exhibited again at the Royal Academy in 1817, and occasionally exhibited there and elsewhere till his death; but his wife's pretensions to be Princess Olive of Cumberland, though they received no support from him, had deprived him of the royal favour, which he never regained. Teaching now became his chief occupation and support. Broken in spirit and health, he laboured on in prison till he became seriously ill with a tumour. He was moved into the rules of the king's bench, but the removal hastened his death, which took place on 28 Dec. 1825. In his will he declared his wife's pretensions to be wholly without foundation. He was buried beside his father. He was a clever artist, and his pictures have lasted much better than his father's.

Some watercolour drawings by John Thomas Serree, and a 'View of the Light-house in the Bay of Dublin, with His Majesty's Yacht, Dorset,' in oils, dated 1788, are in the South Kensington Museum.

His younger brother, Dominic, landscape-painter and drawing-master, exhibited nine works at the Royal Academy between 1778 and 1804, but late in life fell into a hopeless despondency, lost his employment, and was supported by his brother.

[An eulogatory memoir by 'A Friend,' 1826; Redgrave's Dict.; Graves's (Algeron) Dict.; Redgrave's Century; Cat. of Oil Pictures in South Kensington Museum.] O. M.

SERRES, Mrs. OLIVIA (1772-1884), calling herself the Princess Olive of Cumberland, born at Warwick, 3 April 1772, was daughter of Robert Wilmot, house-painter of Warwick, who afterwards removed to London, and of Anna Maria, his wife. She was baptised on 15 April 1772 at St. Nicholas Church, Warwick. Much of her early life was spent at the house of her bachelor uncle, Dr. James Wilmot, a fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, and rector of Barton-on-Heath, Warwickshire. When she was seventeen she received lessons in drawing at her father's house in London from John Thomas Serres [q. v.], marine-painter. On 17 Sept. 1791 she married her teacher at Barton-on-Heath, her uncle, Dr. Wilmot, officiating. She was under age, and was married by special license, her father, Robert Wilmot, making an affidavit that he was her natural and lawful father and consented to her marriage. The marriage proved unhappy, and in 1804 a separation was arranged.

Afterwards she occupied herself with painting, and gave lessons in art. She exhibited landscapes at the Royal Academy in 1794, and from 1804 to 1808, and at the British Institution in 1806. Obtaining an introduction to some members of the royal family, she was in 1806 appointed landscape-painter to the Prince of Wales. In 1809 she began an incoherent correspondence with him, offering to lend him 20,000*l.* at the same time as she begged for pecuniary assistance. She likewise tried her hand at literature, publishing 'St. Julian,' a novel, in 1805; 'Flights of Fancy: Poems,' in 1806; and subsequently 'Olivia's Letters to her Daughters,' and 'St. Athanasius's Creed explained for the Advantages of Youth,' 1814.

Meanwhile her uncle, Dr. Wilmot, died in 1808, leaving his money to his brother for his life, and afterwards in equal shares to his niece Olive and her brother. In 1813 Mrs. Serres published a memoir of her uncle, as 'The Life of the Author of Junius's Letters, the Rev. James Wilmot, D.D.' She represented him as a person of political and social influence, and, on obviously absurd grounds, asserted that he wrote the letters of Junius (cf. Gent. Mag. 1813 ii. 99, 418, 545, and 1814 i. passim). Four years later—in 1817—in another pamphlet, entitled 'Junius, Sir Philip Francis denied a Letter addressed to the British Nation,' she pretended to prove this statement from evidence of handwriting.

In 1817 she made her first claim to be the daughter of Henry Frederick, duke of Cumberland and Strathearn [q. v.], brother of George III. In a petition to the king she alleged that she was the daughter of the duke by Mrs. Payne, a sister of Dr. Wilmot, and wife of a captain in the navy (cf. Gent. Mag. 1818). In 1820, after the death of George III and the Duke of Kent, she amplified her pretensions, now asserting herself to be the legitimate daughter of the Duke of Cumberland, and in a memorial to George IV assumed the title of Princess Olive of Cumberland. She managed to hire a carriage, placed the royal arms on it, and drove out with her servants dressed in the royal livery. In September 1821 she was at the Islington parish church rechristened as Olive, daughter of the Duke of Cumberland, and Olive, his first wife. A newspaper, called 'The British Luminary,' took up her cause, and Henry Nugent Bell [q. v.], the genealogist, is said to have reported favourably on it.

According to her story—as finally elaborated and supported by what was represented as genuine documentary evidence—Dr. Wilmot of Oxford secretly married a sister of Stanislas, king of Poland, and had by her a daughter, who was placed under the care of Dr. Wilmot's sister, Mrs. Payne. At the age of eighteen the girl won the admiration of both the Duke of Cumberland and the Earl of Warwick, but the earl gave way, and the duke married her at Lord Archer's house in London on 4 March 1767, in the presence of Warwick and James Addez, D.D. Of this marriage she asserted that she was the child, but that ten days after her birth she was substituted for a stillborn daughter of Dr. Wilmot's brother Robert, who was thenceforth reputed to be her father.

In July 1821 Mrs. Serres was arrested for debt, and moved the court for a stay of proceedings on the ground that she was the legitimate daughter of the Duke of Cumberland, and as such was exempt from arrest in civil cases. The court held that, as she had put in bail, she was too late to raise privilege. She now produced what purported to be an early will of George III, witnessed by Chatham and Dunning, leaving 15,000*l.* to 'Olive, the daughter of our brother of Cumberland.' In 1822 she applied to the prerogative court for process to call upon the king's proctor to see George III's will; but the court held that it had no jurisdiction. In March 1823 Sir Gerald Noel, who long interested himself in Mrs. Serres's pretensions, presented a petition to parliament from 'the Princess of Cumberland,' and in June he moved that it should be referred to a select committee. This motion was seconded by Joseph Hume. Sir Robert Peel, the home secretary, declared Mrs. Serres's contentions to be baseless, and the motion was negatived without a division. In 1825 Serres died in the rules of the king's bench, repudiating in his will any belief in the genuineness of his wife's claims. Mrs. Serres spent the rest of her life in difficulties, and, dying on 21 Nov. 1834, within the rules of the king's bench, was buried in St. James's Church, Piccadilly.

Besides the works enumerated which she produced under her own name, she published much anonymously. There are good reasons for believing that she had a hand in the scandalous 'Secret History of the Court of England, and the Authentic Records of the Court of England by Lady Anne Hamilton,' Lady Anne Hamilton denied all responsibility for the work (see 'Hannah Lightfoot' by W. Thoms, reprinted from Notes and Queries).

Mrs. Serres left two daughters. The younger took part with her father. The elder, LAVINIA JANETTA HORTON DE SERRES (1797–1871), married, in 1822, Antony Thomas Ryves, a portrait-painter, and obtained a decree of divorce from him in 1841. She took up her mother's claim, and on her mother's death called herself Princess Lavinia of Cumberland and the Duchess of Lancaster. In 1844 Sir Gerard Noel, her mother's champion, formed a committee of friends to assist her in asserting her alleged rights. A bill was filed against the Duke of Wellington, as executor of George IV, praying for an account of the legacy of 15,000*l.* alleged to have been left to her mother by George III. The court of chancery held, however, that it had no power to give relief under a will that had not been proved in the ordinary fashion. In 1858 she published an 'Appeal for Royalty: a Letter to Her Most Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, from Lavinia, Princess of Cumberland and Duchess of Lancaster.' In this book she related incidentally the fictitious story of an early marriage between George III and Hannah Lightfoot, and published copies of what purported to be certificates, in her possession, of the marriage which she pretended was celebrated by Dr. Wilmot. The document was doubtless forged by her mother.

Mrs. Ryves took advantage of the Legitimacy Declaration Act of 1861 to bring her case again into court. She first obtained in 1861 a declaration of the validity of the marriage of her mother with her father. In June 1866 she petitioned the court to declare that the Duke of Cumberland and Olive Wilmot were lawfully married, and that Olive, afterwards Olive Serres, was their legitimate child. All the documents previously mentioned in the controversy—about seventy in all—were produced; but before the solicitor-general, Sir Roundell Palmer (afterwards Lord Selborne) [q. v.], finished his address for the crown, the jury unanimously declared the signatures to be forgeries.

Mrs. Ryves afterwards published a pamphlet, 'Ryves v. the Attorney-General: Was Justice done?' 1866. She enjoyed a pension from the Royal Academy in consideration of her father's eminence, and died at Haverstock Hill on 7 Dec. 1871, leaving two sons and three daughters.

[Gent. Mag. 1835, ii. 93; Life of J. T. Serres, by a Friend; Hannah Lightfoot and Dr. Wilmot's Polish Princess (reprinted from Notes and Queries), by William J. Thoms; Princess of Cumberland's Statement to the English Nation; Annual Register, 1866, the Trial of Ryves v. the Attorney-General; information kindly supplied by W. A. J. Archbold, esq.] D. J. B.

SERVICE, JOHN, D.D. (1833-1884), Scottish divine, son of John Service, engraver in the calico works of Robert Dalglish, M.P., at Lennoxtown, was born at Campsie on 26 Feb. 1833. He received his education at the Campsie parish school, and then entered the calico works as a clerk. At fifteen he was sent to Glasgow University to study for the church. For several years afterwards he was engaged in literary work, editing the 'Dumbarton Herald' in 1857, and from 1858 till 1862 he was sub-editor under Patrick Edward Dove [q. v.] of Mackenzie's 'Imperial Dictionary of Universal Biography.' He was ordained in the church of Scotland in 1862, and for ten months performed ministerial work at Hamilton, near Glasgow. Shortly afterwards he spent eighteen months in Australia owing to failure of health. At the end of the period he was inducted to St. John's presbyterian church (May 1866) at Hobart Town in Tasmania.

He returned to Glasgow in May 1870, and in 1871 he became assistant to Charles Strong at Anderston, which position he left on being presented by the Earl of Stair to the parish of Inch, near Stranraer. While there he wrote a novel, which, after running through 'Good Words' under the title of 'Novantia,' was issued in 1875 as 'Lady Hasty: a Story of Scottish and Australian Life.' A volume of sermons and essays, entitled 'Salvation Here and Hereafter,' appeared in 1877, and caused a sensation in Scotland on account of its broad-church views. Service also wrote much in the 'Glasgow Herald' and other newspapers. In 1871 he contributed to the 'Contemporary Review' an article entitled 'The Spiritual Theory of Another Life.' On 30 April 1877 Glasgow University conferred on Service the degree of D.D., and on 19 Dec. 1878 he was appointed minister of the new west-end church at Hyndland, Glasgow, a position he occupied until his death on 16 March 1884.

On 29 April 1869 Service married Jessie, second daughter of James Bayne, teacher of music in Glasgow, by whom he had four sons and two daughters.

A volume of 'Sermons by Service was published in 1884, with a prefatory notice and portrait of the author. His 'Prayers for Public Worship' appeared in 1886. In 1880 he contributed an essay on Burns to Mr. T. H. Ward's 'English Poets.'

[Notice prefixed to Service's Sermons, 1884; private information.] G. S.-x.

SETCHEL, SARAH (1803-1894), water-colour painter, daughter of John Frederick Setchel, a bookseller in King Street, Covent Garden, London, was born in 1803. After leaving school, she took up drawing with energy, but received no regular instruction beyond that which she derived from studying at the British Museum and the National Gallery, and from some lessons in miniature-painting from Louisa Sharpe [q. v.] Her first exhibited work, 'Fanny,' appeared at the Royal Academy in 1831, and she continued to exhibit there and at the Society of British Artists until 1840, when she sent to the latter exhibition 'A Scene from Howitt's Rural Life of England.' She was elected in 1841 a member of the New Society (now the Royal Institute) of Painters in Water-colours, and in the following year contributed to its exhibition 'A Scene from "Smugglers and Poachers" in Crabbe's Tales of the Hall,' a drawing of much power and pathos, representing a prison interior where a young man whose life is in jeopardy is visited by his betrothed. It became very popular, and was engraved in mezzotint by Samuel Bellin as 'The Momentous Question.' Her works appeared but seldom in the exhibitions, and one other only became well known. This was 'The Heart's Resolve,' a subject from Crabbe's tale of 'Jesse and Colin,' exhibited in 1850, and engraved by Samuel Bellin as a companion plate to 'The Momentous Question.' She continued to exhibit domestic subjects until 1867, but her later works did not sustain her earlier reputation.

Miss Setchel died at Sudbury, near Harrow, Middlesex, on 8 Jan. 1894, aged 80.

[Miss Clayton's English Female Artists, 1876, ii. 124-9; Times, 17 Jan. 1894; Athenæum, 1894, i. 90; Exhibition Catalogues of the Royal Academy, Society of British Artists, and New Society of Painters in Watercolours, 1831-1867.] R. E. G.

SETON, SIR ALEXANDER (d. 1311-1340), keeper of Berwick, was probably a brother of Sir Christopher Seton [q. v.]. His name is found among those of the Scottish nobles who, in 1320, signed the letter to the pope asserting the independence of Scotland. From Robert I he received the manor of Tranent and other lands, as well as the fortalice and lands of Fawside. In February 1311-12 he was named prior or inquisitor of forfeited lands in Lothian (Cal. Documents relating to Scotland, 1307-57, No. 245). He had a safe-conduct in September 1322 to go and return from England (ib. No. 767), and on 26 July 1324 he received a safe-conduct to go to Scotland and come again (ib. No. 846). In 1327 he was appointed keeper of Berwick (Exchequer Rolls of Scotland, i. 63), and while it was besieged by the English in 1333 held command of the town, the Earl of March being entrusted with the defence of the castle. After a long blockade, during which provisions ran short, they agreed to capitulate within a certain time unless succour was obtained, giving as hostage, among others, Thomas Seton, son of Sir Alexander. Just before the period expired Sir William Keith succeeded in throwing himself into the town with a body of Scots soldiers. Keith, who was now chosen governor, refused to surrender, whereupon Edward, on the ground that the Scots had broken the stipulations of the treaty, hanged Thomas Seton before the gate of the town in the sight of the garrison. Alarmed for the safety of the other hostages, the Scots renewed negotiations, and signed an agreement to deliver up the town, unless they were relieved before 19 July by two hundred men-at-arms or the English were defeated in pitched battle. It was accordingly surrendered after the defeat of the Scots at Halidon Hill on 19 July 1333.

Seton was present in Edward Baliol's parliament on 10 Feb. following, and witnessed the cession of Berwick to the English. He had a safe-conduct to go into England, 15 Oct. 1337, and he was one of the hostages for John, earl of Moray, on his liberation in August 1340. By his wife Christian, daughter of Chayne of Straloch, he had three sons and a daughter: Alexander, killed in opposing the landing of Edward Baliol, 6 Aug. 1332; Thomas, put to death by Edward III before the walls of Berwick; William, drowned during an attack on the English fleet at Berwick in July 1333; and Margaret, who being predeceased by her three brothers, became heiress of Seton. She married Alan de Wyntoun, whose son, Sir William Seton of Seton, was created a lord of parliament.

[Calendar of Documents relating to Scotland; Exchequer Rolls of Scotland; Rymar's Federa; Douglas's Scottish Peerage (Wood), ii. 640-1.] T. F. H.

SETON, SIR ALEXANDER, first EARL OF HUNTLY (d. 1470), was the elder son of Alexander Seton (second son of Sir William Seton of Seton), by Elizabeth Gordon, only daughter and heiress of Sir Adam Gordon, lord of Gordon, killed at Homildon, 14 Sept. 1402. On 20 July 1408 Seton and his wife received from Robert, duke of Albany, a charter, with remainder to their heirs, of the lands and baronies of Gordon, and other lands belonging to the late Lord of Gordon; and Seton was thereafter styled Lord of Gordon and Huntly. The son was one of the Scots nobles who attended Princess Margaret of Scotland to France in 1430 on her marriage to the dauphin Louis, son of Charles VIII; and in the following year he was sent to England to treat of a peace. In January 1445-6 he happened, on his way home from attending the court, to be the guest of the Ogilvy at Castle Ogilvy, when they were preparing for combat against the Crawfords, and shared in their defeat at Inverquaharity. Naturally, therefore, he supported the king against the league of Douglas with the Earls of Crawford and Ross, and, after the assassination of Douglas by the king in Stirling Castle in 1452, he was appointed (having in 1449 been created Earl of Huntly) lieutenant-general of the kingdom, and entrusted with the special task of subduing Crawford. On 15 March he encountered him near Brechin and totally defeated him, but not without severe loss, his two brothers, Sir William and Sir Henry Seton, being among the slain. During his absence his lands were wasted by the Earl of Moray, brother of the late Douglas; but on his return from his victory at Brechin he devastated the lands of Moray, and plundered and burnt the city of Elgin. Ultimately he succeeded in completely restoring order, and, having come to terms with Crawford, contrived during the king's progress in the north in 1453 that Crawford and his followers should appear before the king in beggarly apparel, when he so successfully interceded for them that they received a free pardon, and Crawford was restored to his estates and titles.

Huntly was one of the commanders at the siege of Roxburgh Castle in 1460, when the king was killed by the bursting of one of the siege guns. He died at Elgin on 14 July 1470. By his first wife, Jean, daughter and heiress of Robert de Keith, grandson and heir of Sir William de Keith, great marischal of Scotland, he had no issue. By his second wife, Egidia, daughter and heiress of Sir John Hay of Tulliebody, Clackmannanshire, he had a son Sir Alexander Seton, ancestor of the Setons of Touch, Stirlingshire. By his third wife, Elizabeth, daughter of William, lord Crichton, lord high-chancellor of Scotland, he had three sons and three daughters, who took the name of Gordon, the succession to the earldom of Huntly being settled on the issue of this marriage, by charter 29 Jan. 1449-50. The sons were George Gordon, second earl of Huntly [q. v.]; Sir Alexander of Midmar, ancestor of the Gordons of Abergeldie; and Adam, dean of Caithness and rector of Pettie.

[Lindsay of Pitseottie's Chronicle; Bishop Lesley's History of Scotland; Exchequer Rolls of Scotland; Tytler's History of Scotland; William Gordon's House of Gordon; Douglas's Scottish Peerage (Wood), i. 648-4.] T. F. H.

SETON, ALEXANDER (d. 1542), Scottish friar and reformer, was educated at the university of St. Andrew, and is probably to be identified with a student of that name who was a determinant in 1516. According to Calderwood (History, i. 93), he was 'brother to Ninian Seton, laird of Touch,' and if so he was the youngest son of Sir Alexander Seton of Touch and Tullybody, by Lady Elizabeth Erskine, daughter of Thomas, second earl of Mar. It was probably about 1534 or 1535 that he began, according to Knox, to 'tax the corrupt doctrine of the papacy' (Works, i. 45), maintaining that the 'law of God had of many years not been truly taught' (ib.) His statements, reflecting especially on the conduct of the bishops, gave such offence that they accused him to James V, whose confessor he was, whereupon, dreading the king's anger, he suddenly left for England. From Berwick he sent the king a letter, in which he offered to return to Scotland and debate the matters in dispute in his presence before any bishop, abbot, friar, or secular he might name (printed in Knox, i. 48-52). According to Knox, he 'taught the evangel' in England for some years (ib. p. 64), but in 1541 he made a recantation at St. Paul's Cross in London, which was published with the title, 'The Declaracion made at Pauls Crosse in the Cytye of London, the fourth Sunday of Advent, by Alexander Seyton, and Mayeter William Tolwyn, pereone of St. Anthonyes in the sayd Cytye of London, the year of our Lord God MDXLI, newly corrected and amended. Imprinted at London in Saynt Sepulchres paryashe in the Olde Bayly by Richard Lant. Ad imprimum solum.' He was for some time chaplain to Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, in whose house he died in 1542.

[Histories of Knox and Calderwood; Foxe's Book of Martyrs; Laing's Notes to Knox's History.] T. F. H.

SETON, SIR ALEXANDER, first EARL OF DUNFERMLINE (1556-1622), born about 1555, was fourth son of George, fifth lord Seton [q. v.], by Isabel, daughter of Sir William Hamilton of Sanguhar. Sir John Seton (d. 1594) [q. v.] was his brother. Being intended for the church, he went to Rome, where he studied at the College of Jesuits. It was probably before this that (on 17 Sept. 1565) he received from Queen Mary a grant of the priory of Pluscardine, of which his father had been economus and commissioner since 17 April 1561. In his sixteenth year he delivered with great applause an oration, 'De Ascensione Domini,' in the pope's chapel of the Vatican before Gregory XIII and the cardinals. This was probably in December 1571; for mention is made of his having about this time been presented to the pope, who commanded him to be treated as his own son (Cal. State Papers, For. 1569-71, No. 2186). According to Lord Kingston (Continuation of the History of the House of Seton), he was 'a great humanist in prose and verse, Greek and Latin, and well versed in the mathematics and great skill in architecture.' He is supposed to have taken holy orders, and it is also customary to state that the occurrence of the Reformation caused him either to give up thoughts of entering the church or to abandon the holy vocation; but the definite notice of his presentation to the pope in 1571 shows that he had not even entered on his studies when the Reformation took place. But whatever his original intentions, and whatever the cause of his abandoning them, if he did abandon them, he ultimately began the study of law, and, after attending various lectures in France, returned to Scotland, where he at length passed advocate. At some unknown period, but probably on the fall of Mary Stuart, he was deprived of the priory of Pluscardine which was held successively by Alexander Dunbar and James Douglas, natural sons of James, earl of Morton; but after the fall of Morton Douglas was denounced a traitor, and in April 1581 the priory was restored to Seton.

Although he became nominally a protestant, Seton appears to have remained on good terms with his catholic instructors; and on an English jesuit apprehended on 1 March 1583 a letter was found from him to the master of the seminary at Rome (CALDERWOOD, History of the Kirk of Scotland, iii. 702). Thereupon the general assembly of the kirk sent a deputation to the king and council to cause him to undergo trial for the offence (ib. p. 706). The king promised that he should be sent for and confronted with the jesuit (ib. p. 707). The result is not stated, but it seems to have been satisfactory to the king, if not to the kirk, for the same year the prior accompanied his father, Lord Seton, on an embassy to France.

After the fall of Arran, in 1585, Seton was chosen one of the king's new privy councillors, under the act passed on 10 Dec. On 27 Jan. 1586 he was chosen an extraordinary lord of session, when he took his seat as prior of Pluscardine; and on 16 Feb. he was appointed an ordinary lord, as Baron Urquhart, the lands of Urquhart and Pluscardine having been united into a barony and granted to him. As the genuineness of his protestantism was suspected, the kirk succeeded in insisting that before he undertook office as ordinary lord he should partake of the communion at the time appointed by the ministers of Edinburgh ('Book of Sederunt,' quoted in BRUNTON and HAYS, Senators of the College of Justice, p. 199). On 4 April 1588 he was named a commissioner for assessing the taxation of 10,000*l.* to defray expenses in connection with the king's approaching marriage (Reg. P. C. Scotl. iv. 269). On 28 May 1593 he was appointed lord president of the court of session, and from this time may be ranked as one of the principal political advisers of the king. On 9 Jan. 1590 he was named one of the eight auditors of the exchequer known as the Octavians (Reg. P. C. Scotl. v. 255), of whom he was regarded as the chief. Shortly afterwards he gave indications of his catholic sympathies by a speech at the meeting of the convention of estates, in which he urged the recall of the banished catholic earls, on the ground that it was safer they should return than remain abroad to plot against the state (CALDERWOOD, v. 438). It was scarce to be expected that the kirk authorities would coincide with this view of the matter, and its commissioners ordained that, on 2 Nov., he should appear before the synod of Lothian for dealing in favour of the Earl of Huntly (ib. p. 448). Of this, says Calderwood, he 'purged himself very largely' (ib.) But the kirk remained unsatisfied in regard to this and other matters; and the feeling against him found special expression in the tumult in Edinburgh in the following December, one of the requests made by the four commissioners of the kirk sent to the king immediately afterwards being that he should 'remove from his company' Lord-president Seton and others 'thought to be authors of the chief troubles of the kirk,' and known to be representatives of the 'excommunicated earls' (CALDERWOOD, v. 513-514; 'Narrative of the King' in Reg. P. C. Scotl. v. 362-3). Not long afterwards the king accepted the resignation of the Octavians. Nevertheless the kirk, by its violence, obtained no substantial benefit, but the opposite; and the triumph of the king over the unruly city was completed by the appointment of Lord Urquhart as its lord provost, an office which he held for nine years in succession.

On 4 March 1597-8 Seton obtained a letter under the great seal erecting the barony of Fyvie into a free lordship, with the title of a lord of parliament; and shortly afterwards he was intrusted with the guardianship of the king's second son, Prince Charles, afterwards Charles I. In December he was also chosen one of the king's new privy councillors, on the limitation of the number to thirty-one (Reg. P. C. Scotl. v. 500). But though closely identified with the general policy of the king, he on two remarkable occasions displayed an independence which says much for his integrity and honour. When the king by a personal appeal—which virtually amounted to a demand—attempted to reverse a decision of the court of session passed in favour of Robert Bruce, whom the king had deprived of his stipend, Seton rose and told him that this was a question of law, in which they were sworn to do justice according to their consciences and the statutes of the realm: that of course the king could command them to the contrary, but that in that case he and every honest man on the bench would either vote according to his conscience, or resign and not vote at all (Nicolson to Cecil, 16 March 1598-9, quoted in TYTLER, History of Scotland, ed. 1864, iv. 270). Still more creditable to his honour and manliness—for here he was not placed in any official dilemma—was his opposition at the convention at Perth, in June 1600, to the king's foolish demand for money to maintain a standing army, that he might be able, on the death of the queen of England, to make good his rights to the succession (ib. p. 282). On the accession of James to the throne, Prince Charles—afterwards Charles I—who was not deemed strong enough to be removed south, remained in Seton's charge; and after the queen's removal to England Seton was appointed a commissioner for the management of her property in Scotland (ib. p. 587). On 12 Jan. 1604 he was named vice-chancellor, to represent the king in parliament in the absence of the chancellor (Reg. P. C. Scotl. vi. 596), and by the parliament which met at Perth in July he was appointed one of the commissioners for the union with England. Here his masterly knowledge of all legal details, combined with a strongly independent judgment, was of invaluable service to the Scottish commissioners in the arrangements as to trading privileges and interests. It was therefore found advisable that he should be made chancellor instead of Montrose, who accepted the nominal dignity of commissioner for his majesty for life. He resigned the presidency of the court of session on being made chancellor, and he was also (6 March 1606) created Earl of Dunfermline. So highly was the nation gratified with the result of his services on the commission that on his return to Edinburgh he was 'conveyed with many people of all ranks' after a manner 'no subject was seen before to come accompanied to Edinburgh' (CALDERWOOD, vi. 274).

Although the ecclesiastical leanings of Dunfermline were apparently catholic, he was not supposed to be specially favourable to the establishment of an episcopacy. The mild measures adopted by him against the Aberdeen assembly of July 1606 may, however, have been due mainly to inadvertence; and the supposition that he had in any sense connived at its deliberations, as the episcopalians insinuated, is extremely improbable. Nevertheless, the king ordered that the charge against him should be strictly investigated; but a dignified letter from the chancellor, in which he forcibly represented the absurdity of the charge, sufficed to defeat the purpose of his enemies. The king, with the shrewd common-sense which, however uncertain in its operation, usually stood him in good stead in important emergencies, and with the unblushing disregard of legality in which he took special delight, affirmed that he 'would not have him convicted,' nor would he put him out of office although 'the matter were proven' (see especially the summary of the evidence by Professor Masson in footnote to Reg. P. C. Scotl. vii. 498—498). Probably the king was moved by the desire for, or promise of, Dunfermline's co-operation in the Red parliament, which met at Perth shortly afterwards, when, mainly through the management of Dunfermline and Dunbar, acts were passed 'anent the king's majesty's prerogative' and 'anent the restitution of bishops.

On account, it would seem, of Dunfermline's supposed sympathies with Lord Balmerino [see ELPHINSTONE, JAMES, first LORD BALMERINO], the king in 1608 wrote to the town council requesting that, instead of re-electing Dunfermline as provost, they should elect one of their own neighbours. The council disregarded this advice; but, learning that the king was deeply offended, they with Dunfermline's consent, and probably at his suggestion, permitted him to resign, and elected Sir John Arnot in his stead (CALDERWOOD, vi. 819). In October of the following year he paid a visit to the king in England, when he was chosen a member of the English privy council. On the death of Dunbar, in January 1611, Dunfermline and others of the council, says Calderwood, took journey to London, 'fearing altoration, and every man seeking his own particular' (ib. vii. 154). In the purpose of their journey they were successful. Dunfermline inherited Dunbar's place of authority and influence in the king's counsels, and when in London obtained the custody of the palace and park of Holyrood, and was named one of the new Octavians (ib. p. 158). In October of the following year he acted as the king's commissioner at the parliament of Edinburgh, in which the act of 1592, establishing presbyterianism, was rescinded. He died at his seat of Pinkie House, near Musselburgh, on 16 June 1622, in the sixty-seventh year of his age.

Dunfermline was thrice married. By his first wife, Lillias, second daughter of Patrick, third lord Drummond, and sister of James, first earl of Perth, he had five daughters: Anne, married to Alexander, viscount Fenton, only son of Thomas, first earl of Kellie; Isabel, married to John, first earl of Lauderdale; Margaret, died in infancy; another Margaret, married to Colin, first earl of Seaforth; and Sophia, married to David, first Lord Lindsay of Balcarres. By his second wife, Grizel Leslie, fourth daughter of James, master of Rothes, he had a son Charles, who died young, and two daughters—Lillias, unmarried, and Jean, married to John, eighth lord Yester. By his third wife, Margaret Hay, sister of John, first earl of Tweeddale, he had a son, Charles, second earl of Dunfermline [q. v.], and two daughters—Grizel, unmarried, and Mary, died young.

The best testimony to Dunfermline's character is found in the fact that Spotiswood, who did everything possible to work his overthrow, admits that he 'exercised his place with great moderation, and to the contentment of all honest men;' and that, although 'inclining to the Roman faith,' he was 'very observant of good order, and one that hated lying and dissimulation, and above all things studied to maintain peace and quietness.' Calderwood expresses virtually the same opinion: 'He was a good justicier, courteous and humane, both to strangers and to his own country people, but no good friend to the bishops.'

Dunfermline is supposed to have been the architect of his own mansions. He in great part rebuilt Fyvie Castle, Aberdeenshire, in which he introduced the French arch. He also built the principal part of Pinkie House. Dempster assigns to Dunfermline the authorship of 'Orationes Solemnibus aliquot Festis coram Pontifice;' but this is a mere magnification of the statement that, while a youth, he delivered one single oration before the pope. Two of his Latin epigrams are prefixed to Bishop Lesley's 'History of Scotland.' He also addressed an epigram to Sir John Skene [q. v.] on the publication of his treatise 'Regiam Majestatem.' A Latin epitaph by him in commemoration of his parents is in Seton church.

A half-length portrait of Dunfermline, by Zuccherro, is at York, and he is included in the group of the Seton family by Sir Anthony Mor or More [q. v.]

[Reg. P. C. Scotl.; Histories of Spotiswood and Calderwood; Oul. State Papers, Scotland, For. Ser. during the reign of Elizabeth, and Dom. Ser. during the reign of James I.; Branton and Haig's Senators of the College of Justice; Sir Richard Maitland's History of the House of Seton in the Bannatyne Club; George Seton's Memoir of Alexander Seton, Earl of Dunfermline, 1882; Douglas's Scottish Peerage (Wood), i. 480-1.] T. F. H.

SETON, ALEXANDER, sixth EARL OF EGLINTON (1688-1661). [See MONTGOMERIE.]

SETON, ALEXANDER, VISCOUNT KINGSTON (1621?-1691), born about 1621, was the third son of George, third earl of Winton [q. v.], by his first wife, Lady Anne Hay, eldest daughter of Francis, eighth earl of Errol. On the visit of Charles I. to Seton Palace in 1638, Alexander Seton, a youth of twelve, welcomed the king in a formal Latin oration. In 1636 he went to study at La Flèche in France, and afterwards he made a tour through a great part of France, Italy, and Spain. He returned to Scotland in 1640, but, to avoid subscribing the covenant, went in 1643 to Holland. Venturing to return some time afterwards, and still declining to subscribe, he was excommunicated in Tranent church on 8 Oct. 1644. He then crossed over to France, where for some time he remained in attendance on the young Prince Charles. After the coronation of Charles II at Scone, he was created Viscount Kingston and Lord Craigiehall by patent dated at Perth Saturday, the 4th day of January 1651 (BALFOUR, Annals, iv. 251). He wrote a continuation of Sir Richard Maitland's 'History of the House of Seton' (Bannatyne Club). He died on 21 Oct. 1691. By his first wife, Jean, daughter of Sir George Fletcher, he had a daughter, Jean Seton, married to James, third lord Mordington. By his second wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Archibald Douglas of Whittinghame, he had three daughters and six sons. The sons were: Charles, master of Kingston; George; Alexander; Archibald, second viscount Kingston; John; and James, third and last viscount Kingston, who, for his share in the rebellion of 1715, was attainted by parliament. He was further married to Elizabeth Hamilton, third daughter of John, first lord Belhaven, and to Lady Margaret Douglas, daughter of Archibald, earl of Angus, but left no issue by either of these marriages.

[Balfour's Annals; extracts from the Family Bible in Duns Castle, in Sir Richard Maitland's Genealogy of the House and Surname of Seton, 1830; Douglas's Scottish Peerage (Wood), ii. 39.] T. F. H.

SETON, SIR ALEXANDER, LORD PITMEDDEN (1689?-1719), Scottish judge, born about 1640, was younger son of James Seton of Pitmedden (killed at the battle of Bridge of Dee, June 1689) and Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Samuel Johnston of Elphinston. He was admitted an advocate of the Scottish bar on 10 Dec. 1661, and was knighted by Charles II in 1664. He was nominated an ordinary lord of the court of session on 31 Oct. 1677, on the death of Sir Richard Maitland of Pittrichie, and took his seat as Lord Pitmedden on 13 Nov. 1677. He was also admitted a lord of justiciary on 5 July 1682, on the promotion of Lord-president Falconer, and was created a baronet of Nova Scotia on 15 Jan. 1684. He represented the county of Aberdeen in parliament in 1681, 1685, and 1686, and gave deep offence by the boldness with which he opposed the meaasures of the government. James II was resolved to secure the repeal of the test and penal laws, and of nine judges who held seats in parliament, Pitmedden was the only one who opposed this royal will. He was consequently removed from office by a royal letter dated 12 May 1688. At the revolution he declined reappointment as a judge, holding it to be inconsistent with the oath of allegiance which he had taken to James; and, retiring into private life, he died in 1719. He married Margaret, daughter of William Lauder, one of the clerks of session, by whom he had five sons and five daughters (DOUGLAS, Baronage, p. 184).

According to Wodrow, Pitmedden possessed a vast and curious library. He wrote 'A Treatise of Mutilation and Demembration and their Punishments' as an appendix to the 1699 edition of Sir George Mackenzie's 'Laws and Customs of Scotland in Matters Criminal.' He was also the author of 'Explanation of the XXXIX Chapter of the Statutes of King William concerning Minors,' Edinburgh, 1728, 8vo.

SIR WILLIAM SETON (d. 1744), second baronet of Pitmedden, the eldest son, was in his father's lifetime chosen to represent the county of Aberdeen in the Scots parliament from 1702 till 1706, when the queen named him one of the commissioners to treat of the union between Scotland and England. He was also made one of the commissioners to adjust the equivalent to be allowed to Scotland in recognition of the agreement by the Scots to equality of duties, and consequently to liability for a share of the English debt. He died in 1744, having married Catherine, daughter of Sir Thomas Burnet of Leys, by whom he had issue four sons and four daughters. Sir William wrote: 1. 'The Interest of Scotland in Three Essays,' 1700, 8vo. 2. 'Some Thoughts on Ways and Means for making this Nation a Gainer in Foreign Commerce,' 1706, 8vo. 3. 'Scotland's Great Advantages by an Union with England,' 1706, 4to (reprinted in Scott's edition of 'Somers Tracts'). He also published a 'Speech on the First Article of the Treaty of Union,' 1706.

[Branton and Haig's Senators of the College of Justice; Anderson's Scottish Nation, iii. 440; Seton's Memoir of Alexander Seton, earl of Dunfermline; Douglas's Baronage, p. 184; Mackinnon's Union of England and Scotland, p. 218; Catalogue of Advocates' Library.]

G. S.-H.

SETON, ALEXANDER (1814-1852), lieutenant-colonel, born at Mounie in Aberdeenshire on 4 Oct. 1814, was the second but eldest surviving son of Alexander Seton of Mounie, by Janet Skene, his wife, daughter of Skene Ogilvy, D.D., minister of Old Machar, Aberdeenshire. He was descended from Sir Alexander Seton, lord Pitmedden [q. v.] Alexander was educated at home until the age of fifteen, and then studied mathematics and chemistry for some months under Ferdinando Foggi at Pisa. On 23 Nov. 1832 he was gazetted second lieutenant in the 21st or royal North British fusiliers, and next year he was sent with part of his regiment to the Australian colonies. He returned to Scotland on leave in 1838, and was promoted to a first lieutenantcy on 2 March. He rejoined his regiment in India, and received a company on 14 Jan. 1842. Shortly after he exchanged into the 74th, and was stationed at Chatham. There he studied for two years in the senior department of the Royal Military College, and in November 1847 received a first-class certificate. In 1849 he proceeded to Ireland as assistant deputy quartermaster-general of the forces there. He held this post till 24 May 1850, when he was promoted to a majority. On 7 Nov. 1851 he obtained the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and about the same time was ordered to take command of the drafts destined for the Cape of Good Hope, where his regiment was engaged in the Kaffir war. He sailed in the steam troopship Birkenhead, which on the morning of 20 Feb. 1852 struck on a rock in False Bay, twenty miles south of Cape Town, and foundered in little more than ten minutes. In spite of the sudden nature of the catastrophe, Seton issued his orders with perfect calmness. The scene is said by an eyewitness to have resembled an embarkation, with this difference that there was less confusion. The boats could only contain the women and children, and out of 688 persons 445 were lost, Seton himself being killed by the fall of part of the wreck. He died unmarried, and his property descended to his younger brother, David. The heroism displayed by Seton and the rest of those on board the Birkenhead was commemorated by Sir Francis Doyle in a poem on 'The Loss of the Birkenhead,' in 'The Return of the Guards and other Poems' (1856; cf. R. L. STEVENSON, Essay on Admirals, and RUDYARD KIPLING, Seven Seas).

[A Short Memoir of Alexander Seton, 1854; Burke's Landed Gentry, 6th edit.; Annual Register, 1852, pp. 470-2; Notes and Queries, 8th ser. ix. 492; Cornhill Mag. February 1897.]

E. I. O.

SETON, CHARLES, second EARL OF DUNFERMLINE (d. 1878), was the son of Alexander Seton, first earl of Dunfermline [q. v.], by his third wife, Margaret Hay, sister of John, first earl of Tweeddale, and succeeded his father on 16 June 1622. He was one of the leaders of the Scots covenanting army which in June 1639 took up a position on Dunee Law to bar the progress of Charles northwards, and on 6 June presented to the king in his camp a petition that he would appoint commissioners to treat in regard to the matter in dispute (BALFOUR, Annals, ii. 324); and he was one of those who signed the articles of pacification, as well as a paper of submission to the king (printed in SPALDING's Memorials, i. 216-217). In November he and John Campbell, first earl of Loudoun [q. v.], were sent to London to report to the king the proceedings of the assembly of the kirk and the parliament for ratification (BALFOUR, ii. 363; SPALDING, i. 230; GUTHRIE, p. 69); but the king refused to receive them, and forbade them to approach within eight miles of the court (SPALDING, i. 235). Dunfermline was also again sent to the king early in 1640, and, on account of the discovery of the letter of the Scots to the king of France, was, with the Earl of Loudoun and the other commissioners, detained for a time in custody. He was colonel in the Scots army which, under Lesley, crossed the Tweed in August. In the following October he was appointed one of the eight commissioners for the treaty of Ripon, and he was also one of the sub-committee appointed for the final conclusion of the treaty in London. While in London he received from the king a lease of the abbacy of Dunfermline for three times nineteen years. In September he was nominated a member of the privy council (BALFOUR, Annals, iii. 67), and the appointment was confirmed in November (ib. p. 149). In 1642 he was appointed the king's commissioner to the general assembly of the kirk of Scotland, which met at St. Andrews on 27 July (SPALDING, Memorials, ii. 172). In January 1646 he was chosen a member of the committee of estates, and, after the surrender of Charles to the Scots at Newcastle, was sent, along with Argyll and others, to treat with him, and accompanied Argyll to London to lay the king's case before the parliament. Having supported the 'engagement' for the attempted rescue of the king in 1648, he was debarred by the Act of Classes from holding any office of public trust. After the king's execution he went to the continent, and he took part in the negotiations at Breda in connection with the recall of Charles II, whom he accompanied to Scotland. In July 1650 he entertained Charles at Dunfermline (BALFOUR, Annals, iv. 84). When in October 1650 the king left Perth and joined the northern loyalists, Dunfermline was one of the commissioners sent to arrange matters with him (ib. p. 115). On 29 October he was on petition from the disabilities imposed on him by the Act of Classes, and permitted to take his seat in parliament (ib. p. 188). Shortly afterwards he was appointed one of the committee of estates for managing the affairs of the army, and he was in frequent attendance on the king during his stay in Scotland. In the army raised for the invasion of England his regiment formed part of the second brigade (ib. p. 300). At the Restoration he was sworn a privy councillor, and on 2 Nov. 1667 he was appointed an extraordinary lord of session, and the same year a lord of the articles. In 1671 he was appointed lord privy seal. He died in January 1673. By his wife, Lady Mary Douglas, third daughter of William, seventh earl of Morton, he had, with one daughter, three sons: Alexander, third earl of Dunfermline, who died soon after succeeding to the title; Charles Seton, killed in a sea-fight against the Dutch in 1672; and James, fourth and last earl, who in 1689 commanded a troop of horse under Dundee at Killiecrankie, and, being outlawed, went to France, where he died without issue in 1699.

[Balfour's Annals; Bishop Guthrie's Memoirs; Spalding's Memorials of the Troubles, in the Spalding Club; Baillie's Letters and Journals, in the Bannatyne Club; Gardiner's Hist. of England; Douglas's Scottish Peerage (Wood), i. 480-1.] T. F. H.

SETON, SIR CHRISTOPHER (1278?-1306), friend of Robert the Bruce, born about 1278, was the son of Sir Alexander Seton of Seton, descended from Philip de Seton, who obtained a charter of the lands of Seton and Winton in East Lothian from William the Lion, to be held in capite of the crown. Sir Alexander Seton (A. 1311-1340) [q. v.] was probably his brother. He is mentioned on 25 May 1299 as being in the twenty-first year of his age (Cal. Documents relating to Scotland, vol. ii. No. 1091). On 4 Oct. 1298-9 he did homage to the king of England for his father's lands (ib. No. 1103), and he is mentioned as in the king of England's service, 13 March 1303-6 (ib. No. 1664), and again did homage on 12 Oct. of the same year (ib. No. 1697). But having married Lady Christina Bruce, third daughter of Robert, earl of Carrick, sister of Robert Bruce, he supported the claims of the Bruce to the Scottish crown, and was present at his coronation at Scone on 21 March 1300. At the battle of Methven on 13 June he saved Bruce when unhorsed by Philip de Mowbray.

After this disaster he fled southwards, and shut himself in Loudoun Castle, Ayrshire, but it was captured by the English, and, being taken prisoner, he was carried to London, where he was hanged and quartered as a traitor. On learning his sad fate Bruce, who was then passing near Dumfries, caused to be founded, on the spot where he learned the tidings, a chapel to the Virgin, in remembrance of his fellow-in-arms and preserver of his life.

[Barbour's Bruce; Fordun's Chronicle; Cal. of Doc. relating to Scotland, vol. ii.; Douglas's Scottish Peerage (Wood), ii. 640-1.] T. F. H.

SETON, GEORGE, first LORD SETON (d. 1478), was, according to Sir Richard Maitland, the son of 'Lord John Seton' (Sir John Seton of Seton), but according to Douglas (Peerage, ed. Wood, ii. 642), his grandson, and the son of Sir William Seton, killed in the lifetime of his father, Sir John Seton, at the battle of Verneuil in Normandy on 17 Aug. 1424. The latter version of his parentage is corroborated by the register of the great seal, where George, lord Seton, is referred to as the grandchild of Sir John (Reg. Mag. Sig. vol. i. No. 832.) According to Sir Richard Maitland, the first Lord Seton, when nine years of age, fell into the hands of Lord-chancellor Crichton, who for a time kept him a prisoner in the castle of Edinburgh, from which he was, however, delivered by the laird of Johnstone. In 1448 he accompanied Crichton on an embassy to France and Burgundy, to arrange for a marriage between James II and the daughter of the French king (RYMER, Fœdera, xi. 218). The same year he was created a peer of parliament by the title of Baron Seton. In March 1451 he conceded to Crichton the lands of Winton in the barony of Seton (Reg. Mag. Sig. vol. i. No. 432). In 1472 and 1473 he was sent on embassies to England (RYMER, xi. 749, 755). He died on 14 July 1478. Maitland describes him as 'a good householder, and all given to nobleness.' By his first wife, Lady Margaret Stewart, only daughter and heiress of John, earl of Buchan, he had a son John, who predeceased him, leaving a son George, second Lord Seton; and, according to Maitland, he had also another son, Dougal. By his second wife, Christian Murray of the house of Tullibardine, he had a daughter Christian.

[Maitland's Genealogy of the House of Seton; Reg. Mag. Sig. Scot. vol. i.; Douglas's Scottish Peerage (Wood), ii. 642-3.] T. F. H.

SETON, GEORGE, fourth LORD SETON (d. 1549), was son of George, third lord Seton (killed at Flodden on 18 Sept. 1513), was grandson of George, second lord (d. 1607), and was great-grandson of George, first lord [q. v.] His mother was Lady Janet Hepburn, eldest daughter of the first Earl of Bothwell. In 1484 he was appointed a commissioner for settling certain border difficulties, and in 1497 he was named a conservator of a treaty with the English. Such was his love of learning that after his marriage he continued his studies at the university of St. Andrews and also at Paris; and he is said to have acquired great skill in surgery and other sciences, including music, theology, and astrology. During a voyage to France his ship was captured by some Dunkirkers and plundered; and in revenge he bought a large vessel, named the Eagle, with which he endeavoured to make reprisals by plundering the ships of the Flemings.

The fourth Lord Seton was in 1526 appointed a member of the parliamentary committee 'pro judicibus,' and on 12 Nov. 1533 an extraordinary lord of session. In January 1542-8 he was entrusted by the governor, Arran, with the custody of Cardinal Beaton in Blackness Castle. Knox affirms (Works, i. 97) that by buddie (i.e. offers or bribes) given to Seton, the cardinal was permitted to return to St. Andrews. The 'buddis,' according to Arran's account, were large sums of money from the cardinal (SADLER, State Papers, i. 37), but, according to another account, an arrangement for an advantageous marriage of two of his daughters (Hamilton Papers, ii. 40). Nominally, the cardinal, though he had returned, was supposed to be still in custody. He went on the bonds of four lords (ib.); and Sir George Douglas assured Sadler that Seton was bound to the governor in 'life and lands' for his custody (SADLER, State Papers, i. 107), and that at St. Andrews he was 'in as sure and strong prison and as strongly kept in his own house' as if he were detained in the strongest fortress in all Scotland (ib.). But all this was almost self-evident pretence. His removal to St. Andrews was inexplicable if it was intended that he should be kept in custody; and whether Seton were bribed or not, he was well aware that the governor—who probably accused Seton of having received bribes mainly to hide his own pusillanimity—had come to shrink from the responsibility of detaining the cardinal in custody, and that, the cardinal once freed, the governor might be safely defied.

Seton was one of those who took the field against Hertford in May 1544, and during his retreat Hertford, no doubt by special instructions from Henry VIII, took revenge, not merely for this, but for Seton's con-vance at the escape of Beaton, by burning the castle and church of Seton. Seton is usually stated to have died in July 1545, an error which appears originally to have been the result of a misprint; for Sir Richard Maitland, his particular friend and near neighbour, affirms the date of the death to be 19 July 1549. That this could not have been a clerical error on Maitland's part is clear from his statement that the English were then besieging Haddington, and were masters of East Lothian, on which account the body was first placed in the abbey of Culross, and not removed for burial in the choir of the college hall of Seton until the retirement of the English.
—

By his first wife, Elizabeth, daughter of John, lord Hay of Yester, Seton had three sons and four daughters: George, fifth lord Seton [q. v.]; John, ancestor of the Setons of Carristoun, Fifeshire; James; Marian, married, first to John, fourth earl of Menteith, and secondly to John, eleventh earl of Sutherland; Margaret, married to Sir Robert Logan of Restalrig; Eleanor, married to Hugh, seventh lord Somerville; and Beatrice, married to Sir George Ogilvy of Dunlugas.

Maitland, who describes Seton as 'a wise and virtuous statesman,' mentions that he 'was well experienced in all games, and took pleasure in hawking, and was holden to be the best falconer of his days.' It was at his request that Sir Richard Maitland undertook to write his 'History of the House of Seton.'

[Knox's Works; Sadler's State Papers; Hamilton Papers; Maitland's History of the House of Seton; Douglas's Scottish Peerage (Wood), ii. 643-4.] T. F. H.

SETON, GEORGE, fifth LORD SETON (1580?-1585), born about 1580, was eldest son of George, fourth lord Seton [q. v.], by Elizabeth, daughter of John, lord Hay of Yester. He was one of the commissioners sent by the parliament of Scotland, 17 Dec. 1557, to witness the nuptials of Queen Mary with the dauphin of France. He is mentioned as lord provost of Edinburgh in November of the same year (Extracts from the Burgh Records of Edinburgh, 1557-71, p. 18), having succeeded Archibald Douglas of Kilspeindie, and, during his absence in France, his friend, Sir Robert Maitland, acted as president (ib. p. 16). He was also provost in 1558-9. Knox states that, although he attended the preaching of the reformer John Willock [q. v.] in 1558, he afterwards resiled to the old beliefs (Works, i. 256), and officially, as provost of Edinburgh, 'greatly troubled and molested the brethren' by taking upon him the protection of the Black and Grey Friars (ib. pp. 362-3). Knox consequently characterises him as 'a man without God, without honesty, and oftentimes without reason' (ib.) His protection of the friars was, however, vain, and on the arrival of the lords of the congregation in Edinburgh in June 1559, he 'abandoned his charge, and permitted them to work their will in the suppression of 'all monuments of idolatry' (ib.) After the departure of Knox from Edinburgh in the autumn of the same year, he was sent with the Earl of Huntly 'to solicit all men to condescend to the queen's mind' by permitting mass to be said in St. Giles's, and allowing the people to choose what religion they would (ib. p. 389), but, as Knox expressed it, 'the brethren stoutly and valiantly in the Lord Jesus gainsaid their most unjust petitions' (ib. p. 390). Shortly after this Seton, according to Knox, without provocation offered 'brak a chaise upon' [endeavoured to capture] Alexander Whitelaw, an agent of Knox, who was coming to Edinburgh, and pursued him without success as far as Ormiston in the belief that he 'had been John Knox' (ib. p. 393).

After the triumph of the protestant party Seton went for a time to France, arriving at Paris on 3 July 1560 (Throckmorton to the queen, 9 Aug., in Cal. State Papers, For. 1560-1, No. 411). On 1 Oct., however, he obtained from Mary [Stuart], queen of France, a passport to pass from France through England into Scotland (ib. No. 593), and, meeting Throckmorton in Paris, he told him that, though he had been 'evilly used' in Scotland, he intended 'to go home and live and die a good Scotchman' (Throckmorton to the queen, 22 Oct., ib. No. 666). On the return of Queen Mary to Scotland in 1561 he was sworn a member of the privy council, and appointed master of the household. On 10 Nov. he and the Earl of Bothwell, who had been at feud, entered into bonds—in presence of the queen and by her express command—to keep the peace to each other until the first February following, under pain 'of dishonour, infamy, and defamation' (Reg. P. C. Scot. i. 183). In 1564 he quarrelled with Maitland of Lethington on account of one Francis Douglas (Cal. State Papers, For. 1564-5, No. 917), and, the queen deeming it advisable that he should for a time leave the country, he obtained permission in March 1564-5 to go to France (Randolph to Cecil, ib. No. 1044). He was still in France when the queen was married to Darnley, but was so high in favour with the queen that she went to his house at Seton to spend the honeymoon (ib. No. 1298). In August following he was recalled to Scotland (ib. No. 1430), and, returning shortly afterwards, became one of the queen's most consistent and devoted supporters during the remainder of her checkered career in Scotland. On the night after the murder of Rizzio, having been made privy to the queen's purpose to escape from Holyrood, he waited in the neighbourhood with a body of horse, and attended her first to Seton and thence to Dunbar. A catholic by conviction, he was one of the few noblemen present at the baptism of the young prince in the castle of Stirling on 17 Dec. 1566; and, when others refused to bear 'the salt, grease, and candle, and such other things,' Seton, with the Earls of Eglinton and Atholl, 'brought in the said trash' (Knox, ii. 536). It was to Seton House that the queen went for privacy after Darnley's assassination, Seton himself vacating the house and leaving it to be wholly occupied by the queen and her attendants. He remained faithful to her after her marriage to Bothwell, and it was at Seton she slept on the day before her surrender at Carberry, Seton being one of her supporters there. He was made privy to the plan for her escape from Loch Leven in May 1568, and, having invaded the neighbourhood with a large body of horse, he, immediately that she touched the shore, convoyed her first to his own castle of Niddrie, Linlithgowshire, and thence to Hamilton. He was one of the leaders at Langside on the 13th, and was there taken prisoner. On 13 Dec. 1569 he gave surety that he would enter into ward in the castle of St. Andrews (Reg. P. C. Scotl. ii. 69). After the assassination of the regent Moray he joined with other lords in support of the queen, and he signed the letter of May 1570 to Elizabeth on her behalf. When the lords deemed it advisable to leave Edinburgh, Seton assembled his supporters at the palace, and 'bragged that he would enter in the town and cause beat a drum [i.e. to summon the people to the queen's standard] in despite of all the carles' (CALDERWOOD, ii. 560). He did so, but without effect (ib.) In his company at Holyrood was the Lady Northumberland, and shortly afterwards she and he were sent on an embassy to the Duke of Alva (ib.; Cal. State Papers, For. 1579-71, No. 1277). There is a tradition that when in Flanders he was forced to support himself by becoming a wagoner; but this is unlikely, although a picture of him as a wagoner is said to have been at one time in the long gallery at Seton. He arrived at the castle of Edinburgh with money from Flanders on 19 Feb. 1572 (ib. 1572-4, No. 144). After the fall of the castle he made his peace with Morton's government, and gave sureties for his obedience and allegiance (Reg. P. C. Scotl. ii. 212). It would appear, however, that then and afterwards he remained under the ban of the kirk's excommunication, for in an action against him before the privy council for refusing to allow a designation of a manse and a glebe, it was declared that 'he had no place to stand in judgment by reason of the sentence of excommunication against him' (ib. p. 314). On 27 June 1577 he, as well as Robert, master of Seton, obtained a license to go abroad (ib. p. 735).

Seton was one of the nobles who assembled in Edinburgh in July 1578 to oppose the reinstatement of Morton in power, some time after his resignation of the regency (MOYSE, Memoirs, p. 14); and for intercepting Bowes, the ambassador of Elizabeth, on the 18th, between Edinburgh and Kirkliston, on his way to Stirling, and compelling him to turn back to Edinburgh, he was summoned before the council, and failing to appear was denounced a rebel and put to the horn (Reg. P. C. Scotl. iii. 11). He was also denounced a rebel on 24 Sept. for failing to answer to a complaint of James Crichton of Cranston-Riddell, for violently preventing Cranston from intromitting with the lands of Tranent (ib. p. 35), but in November gave caution to appear before the council by December (ib. p. 48), and finally gave caution not to make further impediment to Crichton (ib. p. 55). On 7 May 1579 he also answered a summons for intromitting with the king's goods and household stuff (ib. p. 152), which he had pledged in payment of a debt (ib. p. 195). On 12 June Seton and his eldest surviving son, Robert, signed a bond for him and his three sons to serve the king, and cease from having communication with John Hamilton, sometime commendator of Arbroath, and Claud Hamilton, sometime commendator of Paisley (ib. p. 182), against whom the old acts for the murder of the two regents had been revived, and who were then in hiding.

Seton was one of the lords who, after the fall of Morton, conveyed him on 18 Jan. 1580-1 to Dumbarton Castle (MOYSE, p. 29; CALDERWOOD, iii. 484). Before the trial of Morton the king stayed some days at Seton (MOYSE, p. 32). Although justly objected to by Morton as one of his well-known enemies, Seton sat on the assize for Morton's trial, and, with his two sons, he witnessed Morton's execution in a stair south-east of the cross (CALDERWOOD, iii. 575). He was a strong supporter of the Duke of Lennox, and, when Lennox was commanded to depart from Scotland, convoyed him south to England (ib. p. 698). In April 1583 the commissioner of the synod of Lothian complained against him to the king for entertaining a seminary priest (ib. p. 704), but the accusation came to nothing, and in October the king manifested his entire confidence in him by sending him on an embassy to France (Reg. P. C. Scotl. iii. 604). He died on 8 Jan. 1584-5, soon after his return from France, aged about 55.

The Setons, on account of the large number of noble families descended from them, were styled 'Magnus Nobilitatis Domini', and, owing to their intermarriages with the royal family, their shield obtained the addition of the royal or double tressure. The fifth lord is said to have declined an earldom, regarding it as a greater distinction to be Lord Seton, whereupon King James is reputed to have commended his resolution in the following Latin epigram:

Sunt comites, alii ducasque, sunt denique reges:
Setoni Dominus sit satis esset mihi.

By his wife Isabel, daughter of Sir William Hamilton of Sanguhar, high treasurer of Scotland, he had one daughter, Margaret, married to Lord Claud Hamilton, and five sons: George, master of Seton, who died in March 1562; Robert, sixth lord Seton, who was a special favourite of James VI, and on 16 Nov. 1600 was created Earl of Winton; Sir John Seton, lord Barns [q. v.]; Alexander, prior of Pluscardine and afterwards Earl of Dunfermline [q. v.]; and Sir William Seton Kyllismore, sheriff of Midlothian, and postmaster-general of Scotland.

A painting of Lord Seton and his family, by Sir Anthony Mor or More [q. v.], has been frequently engraved.

[Histories of Knox and Calderwood; Moyses's Memoirs, Lord Herries's Memoirs, and Sir James Melville's Memoirs in the Bannatyne Club; Reg. P. C. Scotl. i.-iii.; Cal. Stats Papers, Scot. Ser. and For. Ser. reign of Elizabeth; Sir Richard Maitland's History of the House of Seton, with continuation by Viscount Kingston in the Bannatyne Club; Douglas's Scottish Peerage (Wood), ii. 644-5.] T. F. H.

SETON, GEORGE, third EARL OF WINTON (1584-1650), second son of Robert Seton, first earl of Winton, by Margaret, daughter of Hugh Montgomerie, third earl of Eglinton, was born in December 1584. His brother, Alexander, took the surname of Montgomerie, and became in 1611 sixth Earl of Eglinton [q. v.]. George succeeded to the earldom of Winton in 1607, in the lifetime of his elder brother, who resigned the title and estates in his favour. In accordance with the old traditions of his family, he entertained James VI at Seton Palace, on his visit to Scotland in 1617, and also twice entertained Charles I in 1633. In 1630 he erected the additional residence of Winton Castle in Peneaitland parish, Haddingtonshire, an original and remarkably striking modification of Tudor architecture. He was referred to by John Maxwell [q. v.], bishop of Ross, and afterwards archbishop of Tuam, in 1638, as 'popishly affected' (Balfour, Annals, ii. 268), and though he took no prominent part in public affairs, seems to have generally favoured the king. He supported the engagement for the king's rescue in 1648, and gave to the commander-in-chief, the Duke of Hamilton, 1,000*l.* in free gift for his equipage. He died at Seton on 15 Dec. 1650 of a palsy, and 'was interred among his ancestors in the church there without any funeral solemnity' (ib. iv. 255). By his first wife, Lady Anne Hay, eldest daughter of Francis, eighth earl of Errol, he had, with three daughters, four sons: George, lord Seton, who having joined Montrose shortly after the battle of Killybrath, was taken prisoner at Philiphaugh, but was finally liberated on a bond of 100,000*l.*, and died at Seton in 1648, leaving, with other children, a son George, lord Seton (d. 1648), whose son George became fourth earl of Winton (d. 1704); Charles; Alexander, viscount Kingston [q. v.]; and Francis. By his second wife, Elizabeth, daughter of John, lord Herries, he had, with five daughters, four sons: Christopher, William, John, and Robert.

[Balfour's Annals; Spalding's Memorials and Gordon's Scots Affairs in the Spalding Club; Douglas's Scottish Peerage (Wood), ii. 643-4.] T. F. H.

SETON, GEORGE, fifth EARL OF WINTON (d. 1749), was the son of George, fourth earl of Winton, by his second wife, Christian, daughter of John Hepburn of Alderston. The father, though only ten years of age when in 1650 he succeeded his grandfather, George Seton, third earl of Winton [q. v.], was fined 2,000*l.* under Cromwell's act of grace. He left Scotland at an early age, and for some time served in the French army. Returning to Scotland, he was employed by Charles I against the covenanters, and commanded a regiment at Pentland in 1666, and at Bothwell Bridge in 1679. At his death in 1704 the son George, fifth earl, was abroad, and as he had ceased to correspond with his friends in Scotland, his residence was unknown. Before his return his right to the earldom was questioned by his cousin, Viscount Kingston [see under SETON, ALEXANDER, 1621?-1691], the marriage of his parents having been irregular; but in 1710 he took steps to have his right to the earldom established, and was served heir to his father. About this time he was described in Mackay's 'Secret Memoirs' as 'a young gentleman who hath been much abroad in the world,' and 'mighty subject to a particular caprice natural to his family.'

Before the outbreak of the rebellion in 1715 the Earl of Winton took steps to organise his own retinue and those of several of his neighbours (Lockhart Papers, i. 492). In a list of Scots nobles he is inserted as having '300 men, most of them with their chief, against the government and in the rebellion' (PATTEN, History of the Rebellion, p. 194). On 14 Oct. he joined the Earl of Kenmure at Moffat, when the chevalier was proclaimed king as James VIII. He strongly opposed the advance into England, recommending that the Jacobite force should proceed by Dumfries to Glasgow, and effect a junction with the western clans. Nevertheless he interposed to induce the highlanders to withdraw from their mutinous attitude against the entry into England; and although he himself was so strongly convinced of its hopelessness that he resolved to return home, he was finally induced, against his better judgment, to take part in the expedition. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Preston on 14 Nov. Alone of the earls tried for treason for their share in the rebellion, he refused to plead guilty. After trial he was found guilty and sentenced to death, but succeeded in making his escape from the Tower by cutting the prison bars, and went to France. He died unmarried at Rome on 19 Dec. 1749.

[Mackay's Secret Memoirs; Lockhart Papers; Patten's Hist. of the Rebellion; State Trials, vol. xv.; Douglas's Scottish Peerage (Wood), ii. 647-8.] T. F. H.

SETON, JOHN, D.D. (1498?-1567), Roman catholic divine, born in or about 1498, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1528. Soon afterwards he was elected a fellow of St. John's on Bishop Fisher's foundation, and he commenced M.A. in 1532. He taught philosophy in his college, and gained high reputation as a tutor. After being ordained priest he became one of Bishop Fisher's chaplains, and attended that prelate in the Tower (BAKER, Hist. of St. John's, ed. Mayor, i. 101). In 1542 he was one of the fellows of St. John's who signed an appeal to the visitor against Dr. John Taylor (d 1544) [q. v.], the master, afterwards bishop of Lincoln. In 1544 he proceeded D.D., and about that time was appointed one of the chaplains to Gardiner, bishop of Winchester and chancellor of the university, who highly esteemed him for his great learning, and collated him to the rectory of Hinton, Hampshire (COOPER, Athena Cantabr. i. 219). On the bishop's trial he bore testimony in his favour. In his deposition he is styled bachelor of divinity. He was present at the disputation with Peter Martyr held at Oxford in 1550. In 1553 he was installed canon of Winchester and in the following year prebendary of Ulskelf in the church of York (LE NEVE, Fasti, ed. Hardy, iii. 220). He was one of the doctors of divinity who, by the direction of Bishop Gardiner, proceeded to Oxford in order to take part in the disputation with Crammer, Ridley, and Latimer, concerning matters of religion, and on this occasion he was incorporated D.D. there on 14 April 1554 (Woon, Fasti Oxon. ed. Bliss, i. 144). In this following year he visited John Bradford in prison, for the purpose of inducing him to recant. In 1558 he attended Thomas Benbridge with the same object. His name is found in a list of the 'papistical clergy' drawn up in 1561, wherein he is described as learned, but settled in papistry, having been ordered to remain within the city of London, or twenty miles compass of the same (STRYPE, Annals of the Reformation, i. 275 et seq.) After suffering imprisonment and enduring much persecution on account of his attachment to the ancient form of religion, he escaped from the country and proceeded to Rome, where he died on 20 July 1567 (Gent. Mag. 1823, i. 218).

Seton's contemporaries bestowed much praise on him for his knowledge of philosophy and rhetoric. He wrote: 1. 'Panegyrici in victoriam illustrissimæ D. Mariæ Angliæ, Franciæ, & Hiberniæ Reginæ, &c. Item in Coronationem ejusdem Sereniss. Reginæ Congratulatio. Ad hæc de Sacrosancta Eucharistia Carmen D. Joanne Setono auctore,' London, 1553, 4to; dedicated to the queen. 2. Latin verses before Dr. Alban Langdale's 'Catholica Confutatio Nic. Ridley,' Paris, 1556. 3. 'Dialectica; annotationibus Petri Carteri, ut clarissimis, ita brevissimis, explicata. Huic accessit, ob artium ingenuarum inter se cognationem, Gulielmi Buelæi arithmetica,' London, 1572, reissued 1574, 1577, 1584, 1599, 8vo; Cambridge, 1631, 8vo; dedicated to Bishop Gardiner. This work was extensively circulated in manuscript among students long before it appeared in print, and for nearly a century it was recognised as the standard treatise on logic.

[Addit. MSS., 5680 f. 40, 24492 f. 12; Ames's Typogr. Antiq. (Herbert), pp. 861, 866, 942, 1206, 1268; Ascham's Epistolæ, pp. (8) 68, 75, 82, 90, 209; Bale's Script. Brit. Cat. p. 720; Bowes's Cat. of Cambridge Books, p. 511; British Mag. xxxii. 511; Dodd's Church Hist. i. 511; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1500-1714, iv. 1334; Foxe's Acts and Monuments (Townsend); Palatine Note Book, iii. 46, Peck's Desiderata Curiosa, 2nd edit. p. 326; Pitts, De Angliæ Scriptoribus, p. 750; Strype's Works (general index); Tanner's Bibl. Brit. p. 664; Warton's Hist. of English Poetry, iii. 347.] T. O.

SETON, SIR JOHN, LORD BARNES (d. 1594), Scottish judge, was the third son of George, fifth lord Seton [q. v.], by his wife Isabel, daughter of Sir William Hamilton of Sanguhar. While still a young man he went to Spain to the court of Philip II, by whom he was made knight of the royal order of St. Jago and master of the household. He was appointed master of the stable to James VI of Scotland some time before 1581, when he had an encounter with James, earl of Arran (CALDERWOOD, History, iii. 592). The same year he was sent as ambassador to complain to Elizabeth regarding her conduct in interfering in behalf of the Earl of Morton, but was not permitted to enter England. On 27 Jan. 1586-7 he was admitted a member of the privy council (Reg. P. C. Scotl. iv. 139), and on 17 Feb. 1587-8 he was appointed, with the title Lord Barnes, an extraordinary lord of session, in room of his brother, Alexander Seton, afterwards Earl of Dunfermline [q. v.]. He died on 25 May 1594. By his wife Anne, daughter of William, seventh lord Forbes, he had, with other children, a son John who succeeded him.

[Calderwood's Hist. of the Kirk of Scotland; Reg. P. C. Scotl. vols. iii.-iv.; Brunton and Haig's Senators of the College of Justice.] T. F. H.

SETON or SETONE, THOMAS DU (fl. 1344-1361), chief justice of the king's bench, appears as a counsel in the 'Year-Books' from 1344 onwards, and was one of the king's sergeants in 1345, when he applied before the council that the iter in the bishopric of Durham might be foregone for that year. He was appointed to a judgeship, probably in the king's bench, previously to April 1354, when he was a trier of petitions in parliament (Rolls of Parliament, ii. 254). He was a judge of the common pleas in Michaelmas 1355. In 1356 he recovered damages from a woman for calling him 'traitor, felon, and robber' in the public court. On 5 July 1357 Setone was made chief justice of the king's bench, ad tempus; the temporary character of the appointment is shown by the fact that Setone continued to act as judge of common pleas till Michaelmas 1359, and he is so styled when admitted to the king's secret council in the same year. But he must have soon afterwards been raised permanently to the chief-justiceship, which office he held till 24 May 1361, when Henry Green [q. v.] was appointed his successor.

[Foss's Judges of England.] C. L. K.

SETTLE, ELKANAH (1648-1724), city poet, the son of Josias Settle and his wife Sarah, was born at Dunstable on 1 Feb. and baptised on 9 Feb. 1647-8 (Bedfordshire Notes and Queries, vol. iii. pt. vii. 206). He matriculated on 13 July 1668 from Trinity College, Oxford, where his tutor was Abraham Campian, but he left Oxford without taking a degree and proceeded to London. According to Gildon, he once possessed a good fortune, which he quickly dissipated. If Downes may be believed, it was in this same year (1668) that Settle, then barely eighteen, completed his first play, 'Cambyses, King of Persia: a Tragedy.' It was the first new play acted that season at Lincoln's Inn Fields. Bttertont and his wife were in the cast, and, the other parts being 'perfectly well acted,' it 'succeeded six days with a full audience' (Downes, Roscius Anglicanus, 1886, p. 27). It was subsequently produced at Oxford, and was printed in 1671 and 1673. Wood states that Settle's fellow collegian, William Buller Fyfe, had some part in the composition, the plot of which was mainly derived from Herodotus. Settle was inflated by his success, and 'Cambyses' formed the first of a series of bombastic dramas, the scenario of which was discreetly laid in Persia or Morocco.

Settle's triumph was sagerly adopted by Rochester as a means of humiliating Dryden. Through Rochester's influence Settle's next tragedy, 'The Empress of Morocco,' was twice acted at Whitehall, the prologues being spoken respectively by Rochester and by Lord Mulgraves. It seems to have been originally given in 1671, and revived at Dorset Garden in 1673, when Bttertont played it for two weeks with great applause. Though highflown, it is not devoid of merit, and Genest called the plot 'well managed.' In his dedication to the Earl of Norwich, Settle says, 'I owe the story of my play to your hands and your honourable embassy into Africa.' It was published by Cademan in 1671, and again in 1673 with six engravings (one of which represents the front of Dorset Garden), at the enhanced price of two shillings. It is said to have been the first play ever published with engravings (later editions 1687 and 1698). The court was for the time completely won over by Settle's heroic tragedies, passages from which were quoted against Dryden's 'Tyrannic Love' and 'Conquest of Granada,' at the universities, where it was keenly discussed whether Dryden or Settle were the greater genius, the younger fry, said Wood, inclined to Elkanah. As his enemies had anticipated, Dryden's temper was stirred, and with Crowne and Shadwell he clubbed to crush the upstart by an unworthy and abusive pamphlet (Notes and Observations on the Empress of Morocco). Settle was undismayed, and retorted vigorously in 'Notes and Observations on the Empress of Morocco Revised,' 1674, 4to, to which he added, by way of counter-attack, 'Some few Erratas to be printed, instead of the Postscript, with the next edition of the "Conquest of Granada."' Apart from his success, Settle appears to have given the poet small provocation; but Dryden nursed his jealousy, and gave vent to his resentment in the second part of his 'Absalom and Achitophel,' published about November 1682, where his former rival is described as Does, though without knowing how or why,

Mads still a blundering kind of melody,
Spurr'd boldly on, and dashed through thick and thin,

Through sense and nonsense never out or in;
Free from all meaning, whether good or bad,
And, in one word, heroically mad.

Dryden's intention to signalise him had doubtless reached Settle's ears, for he produced almost at the same time his 'Absalom Senior, or Achitophel Transposed' (published at the sign of Sir Edmondbury Godfrey, near Fleetbridge, 1682), a whig reply to the first part of Dryden's satire, with a free description of its author. In several of his later plays the laureate referred contemptuously to Settle, for whom he predicted an audience in Bartholomew Fair. Elkanah took leave of his tormentor in 'Reflections on several of Mr. Dryden's Plays,' 1687, 4to.

In the meantime, notwithstanding the transference of Rochester's patronage to Crowne and Otway, Settle 'rhymed and rattled' persistently. His 'Love and Revenge,' founded upon the 'Fatal Contract' of William Hemings [q. v.], was produced at Dorset Garden in 1675 and printed. In the dedication the dramatist congratulates providence on lengthening the Duke of Newcastle's life, so that he might 'witness the prosperous reign of a great and pious monarch.' In a 'postscript' he attacked Shadwell, a much better writer than himself. His 'Conquest of China by the Tartars' was given at the same theatre, Jevon, who had a leading part, taking great liberties with its turgid periods (Dowries, p. 35; printed London, 1678, 4to). His 'Ibrahim, the Illustrious Bassa: a Tragedy' (based on Georges de Soudéry's 'L'Illustre Bassa'), was licensed on 4 May 1676 and printed (1677 and 1692, 4to), with a dedication to the Duchess of Albemarle, and his 'Fatal Love; or the Forced Inconstancy,' a fustian version of the legend of Clitophon and Leucippe, was given at the Theatre Royal (Drury Lane) in 1680.

Neglected by the court, Settle made overtures to the opposition, and his political bias is sufficiently shown in his next play, 'The Female Prelate, being the History of the Life and Death of Pope Joan,' which was produced at the Theatre Royal in 1680, and printed immediately, with a dedication to Shaftesbury. The invective is outrageous, but the plot and incidents, says Genest, are good (Hist. i. 275). Settle's mastery of scenic effect and the violence of his protestantism led to his unanimous election as organiser-in-chief of the pope-burning procession on Queen Elizabeth's birthday (17 Nov. 1680); and Roger L'Estrange, in 'Heracitus Ridens' (No. 50), described him as poet-laureate and master of ordinance to the whig party, who would vindicate Lucifer's first rebellion for a few guineas. Next year he wrote, at Shaftesbury's instance, his 'Character of a Popish Successor' (1681), which evoked a storm of remonstrance. Settle accentuated his remarks in a revised edition, which he afterwards alleged that Shaftesbury, dissatisfied by its moderation of tone, had retouched. His personal attacks upon the Duke of York are said to have involved him in a duel with Thomas Otway. Of these passages in his life he wrote: 'I now grew weary of my little talent for Dramaticks, and forsooth must be rambling into politics . . . and much have I got by it' (pref. to Distressed Innocence). Determined, at least, not to lose by politics, Settle, upon the dissolution of the Oxford parliament, promptly recanted, and wrote 'A Narrative of the Popish Plot,' 1683, fol., exposing the perjuries of 'Doctor' Oates, and covering with abuse Shaftesbury and his old associates at the 'Green Ribbon Club.' Written with a clever assumption of fairness, the 'Narrative' evoked a cloud of answers and letters, and a heated 'Vindication of Titus Oats.' Settle was undeterred from publishing hostile 'animadversions' upon the dying speeches of William, lord Russell, and Algernon Sidney, and he went so far as to issue 'A Panegyrick on Sir George Jefferies' (1683) on his elevation to the chief-justiceship, Jefferies having been conspicuous as 'Shimei' in his satire of 'Achi-tophel Transpros'd.' His tory enthusiasm reached its climax in 1685, when he published an adulatory 'Heroick Poem on the Coronation of the High and Mighty Monarch, James II' (London, 4to), and shortly afterwards entered himself as a trooper in James's army on Hounslow Heath. He is said, moreover, to have published a weekly sheet in support of the administration.

Upon the revolution Settle recommenced overtures to his whig friends; but, feeling that both parties were looking askance at him, he put in for the reversion of Matthew Taubman's post of city laureate, for which political consistency was not a necessary qualification. Taubman's last pageant was dated 1689; in 1690 the show was intermitted, but Settle was duly appointed city poet in the following year, and issued for lord-mayor's day 'The Triumph of London' (for Abel Roper, London, 4to). His four pageants 1692-5 bear the same title. No pageants are known for 1696-7, but in 1698 Settle produced 'Glory's Resurrection.' He then reverted to the older title until 1702. The 'Triumphs' for the next five years are missing, but Settle issued one for 1708, though the exhibition of that year was frustrated by the death of Prince George of Denmark. It seems to have been the last lord-mayor's show to have been described in a separate official publication.

In the meantime Settle had not abandoned his career as a playwright. His 'Heir of Morocco' (1694, 4to), forming a second part to his 'Emprress of Morocco,' and based upon a slender substratum of facts furnished by the English occupation of Tangier, was produced at the Theatre Royal in 1692 (revived on 19 Jan. 1709). Then after a long interval came his 'Distressed Innocence, or the Princess of Persia' (1691, 4to), founded on the 39th chapter of the 5th book of Theodoret, but 'warped' in favour of the Christians. The piece was given at the Theatre Royal in 1691. His 'New Athenian Comedy' (1693, 4to) and 'The Ambitious Slave,' a tragedy (1694, 4to), were followed at Dorset Garden in 1697 by 'The World in the Moon' (1697, 4to), an opera, of which the first scene was formed by a moon fourteen feet in diameter. Of his 'Virgin Prophess, or the Fate of Troy' (1701, 4to), Genest says that the language and the deviations from the accredited legend were 'disgusting, but the spectacle must have been fine.' 'The City Ramble, or the Playhouse Wedding' (1711, 4to), based to some extent upon the 'Knight of the Burning Pestle' and the 'Coxcomb,' with humorous additions of some merit, was produced at Drury Lane on 17 Aug. 1711. By this time Settle's reputation was so damaged that he determined to bring out the pieces anonymously. But the secret 'happened to take air,' and he fell back upon producing it during the long vacation. His last play, 'The Ladies' Triumph' (1718, 12mo), produced at Lincoln's Inn Fields in 1718, ended with a masque in which Settle skilfully introduced elaborate scenery and machinery.

The theatre and the corporation proved only occasional resources, and very soon after the revolution Settle fulfilled various predictions by letting himself out to write drolls for Bartholomew Fair, love-letters for maid servants, ballads for Pye Corner, and epithalamiums for half a crown. In Bartholomew Fair he served under the show-woman, Mrs. Mynn, and produced at her booth his 'Siege of Troy' in 1707. At the same show he is said to have played a dragon in green leather, whence Pope puts into his mouth the couplet—

Yet lo! in me what authors have to brag on!
Reduced at last to his in my own dragon

(Dunciad, iii. 285; cf. Young's Epistle to Mr. Pope, i. 261-8). As a laureate Settle celebrated with equal readiness the act of succession ('Eusebia Triumphans,' 1702 and 1707), the danger to the church ('A New Memorial,' 1706), the propagation of the Gospel in foreign parts ('A Pindarick Ode,' 1711), the tory peace of 1713 ('Irene Triumphans,' 1713), and the whig triumph two years later ('Rebellion Display'd,' 1715). He seems to have always had in hand a stock of printed elegies and complimentary verses under such titles as 'Augusta Lacrimans,' 'Thalia Lacrimans,' 'Thalia Triumphans,' 'Memorie Fragrant,' to which he affixed names and dedications in accordance with the demand. Resourceful as he was, however, Elkanah's income dwindled until, about 1718, his city friends procured him a retreat in the Charterhouse. He died there, a poor brother, on 12 Feb. 1723-4 (Hist. Reg. Chron. Diary, 1721, p. 11; the Charterhouse burial registers 1710-40 are missing). Five days after his death he was described in the 'Trus Briton' as a man 'of tall stature, red face, short black hair,' who 'lived in the city, and had a numerous poetical issue, but shared the misfortune of several gentlemen, to survive them all.' He married, on 28 Feb. 1673-4, Mary Warner, at St. Andrew's, Holborn (Notes and Queries, 8th ser. xii. 483).

Settle was not deficient in promise as scholar, rhymester, and wit; but he wrecked his career by his tergiversation and by his inept efforts to measure his mediocre capacity against the genius of Dryden. He soon becamea butt for caricature as a voluminous and reckless dunce. 'Recanting Settle,' wrote a critic, when his tragedies and libels could no more yield him penny loaves and ale, 'bids our youth by his example fly, the Love of Politics and Poetry' (Poems on State Affairs, ii. 188). In one of his earliest satires Pope dubbed him Codrus, after the prolix poetaster of Juvenal (LINTOT, Miscell. 1712, revised for Dunciad, i. 183), and in the 'Dunciad' are many jibes at his expense, notably the allusion to the lord-mayor's show, which 'liv'd in Settle's numbers one day more' (bk. i. 90). In 1776, on the occasion of his conversation with Johnson, Wilkes referred to Elkanah as the last of the city poets, and one whose poetry matched the queerness of his name (BOSWELL, Johnson, ed. Hill, iii. 76).

In addition to the works enumerated and minor complimentary pieces, Settle was author of: 1. 'The Life and Death of Major Clancie, the grandest Cheat of this Age,' 1680, 8vo. 2. 'Insignia Batavica; or the barbarous behaviour of the Dutch towards the English in East India,' 1688, 4to. 3. 'The Compleat Memoirs of the Life of that Notorious Impostor, Will. Morrell, alias Bowyer, alias Wickham,' 1694, 12mo; 1699, 8vo. 4. 'Minerva Triumphant. The Muses' Essay. To the Honour of the Generous Foundation, the Cotton Library at Westminster,' 1701 fol. 5. 'Carmen Irenicum. The Happy Union of the Two East India Companies. An Heroic Poem,' 1702, fol. (for 1, 4 and 5, see HAZLITT, Bibl. Coll. 3rd ser. pp. 229-30). Settle also edited the 'Herod and Mariamne' (1673, 4to) of Samuel Pordage [q. v.], and contributed to the popular translation of 'Ovid's Epistles' (1688, 8vo). He re-edited for the stage Sir R. Fanshawe's version of Guarini, which appeared at Dorset Garden in 1676 as 'Pastor Fido, or the Faithful Shepherd' (London, 1677, 4to); 'a moderate pastoral' (GENEST, i. 196). He revised and rewrote the last two acts of Beaumont and Fletcher's 'Philaster' for the Theatre Royal in 1695 (London, 4to).

The British Museum possesses Settle's 'Triumphant of London' for 1691, 1692, 1693, 1694, 1695, 1699, 1703, and his 'Glory's Resurrection' for 1698. The Guildhall Library has all these, with the exception of 1693, and, in addition, the 'Triumphs' for 1701 and 1702.

[Wood's Athenae Oxon. ed. Bliss, iv. 681; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1600-1714; Rawlinson MSS. (in Bodleian), iii. 407; Nichols's Lit. Anecd. i. 41 seq.; Nichols's Lord Mayors' Pageants, 1881; Fairholt's Hist. of Lord Mayors' Pageants, i. 109, 121-2; Langbaine's Dramatic Poets, 1698, p. 123; Dennis's Letters, 1721, vol.

ii.; Dunton's Life and Errors, passim; The Session of the Poets, held at the foot of the Parnassian Hill, 9 July 1696; The Towne Displayed, 1701; Johnson's Poets, ed. Cunningham; Dryden's Works, ed. Scott and Saintsbury; Pope's Works, ed. Elwin; Rochester's Poeme, 1707, p. 19; Oldham, ed. Bell, p. 234; Disraeli's Quarrels of Authors, pp. 206, 288; Masson's Milton, vi. 611; Morley's Bartholomew Fair; Lowe's Betterton, p. 137; Gissing's New Grub Street, 1891, p. 31 (Settle contracted with Shadwell); Beljame's Public et les Hommes de Lettres en Angleterre 152, 207; Ward's English Dram. Lit. ii. 584; Doran's Annals of the Stage; Sitwell's First Whig, pp. 86-7, 101, 202; English Cyclopædia; Lowndes's Bibl. Man. (Bohn); Hazlitt's Bibl. Collections and Notes; Guildhall Libr. Cat. 1889; Brit. Mus. Cat.] T. S.

SETTLE, THOMAS (fl. 1575-1593), divine, born about 1555, matriculated as pensioner at Queens' College, Cambridge, in 1575, but left college without a degree. He was ordained by Bishop Freaque of Norwich, and was minister at Boxted in Suffolk. In May 1586 he was cited before Archbishop Whitgift at Lambeth to answer six charges: that he did not observe the order in the Book of Common Prayer, that he did not use the sign of the cross in baptism, that he did not marry with the ring, that he frequented conventicles, that he denied the validity of private baptism, that he denied the descent into hell. Settle acknowledged his contumacy on the last charge, and refused subscription to any rites or ceremonies. After a stormy dispute with Whitgift he was committed to the Gatehouse, where he was kept prisoner till 1592. On his release he joined the Brownists' congregation, which met privately in London, and was arrested again before the end of the year, while attending a meeting at the house of George Johnson in St. Nicholas Lane. On 6 April 1593 he was brought before the high commission and required to take the oath ex officio, but absolutely declined. He admitted that he had separated himself from the established church for about a year, that he had not taken the sacrament in his parish church for three years, and that he had opposed the discipline of the church for seven years; but he declined to say from whom he had imbibed his opinions. He confessed to being present at illegal religious meetings, and refused to attend public service. He was sent back to prison, and nothing further is recorded of him. He may have been the author of 'Tho. Settle his Catechisme,' London, 8vo, n.d.; licensed to Henry Carr and Henry Hasselup, 22 May 1587. There is no reason to identify him with the Settle mantioned by R. Bancroft (Dangerous Positions, p. 81).

[Brook's Lives of the Puritans, ii. 48-8; Cooper's Athenæ Cantabr. ii. 402; Dextar's Congregationalism, pp. 256 n., 274; Hanbury's Historical Memorials, i. 87 n., 88; Ames's Typogr. Antiq. ed. Herbert, p. 1838; Neal's Puritans, i. 388-9; Strype's Annals, 1824, iv. 134.] R. B.

SEVENOKE, SIR WILLIAM (1878?-1433?), lord mayor of London, born about 1378, is said by Lambert (Perambulation of Kent, 1596, p. 620) to have been 'found lying in the streetes at Sennocke . . . and named after the place where he was taken up.' The city records (quoted by Stow) state that he was the son of William Rumschedde, and apprenticed to Hugh de Bois, a citizen and 'ferrer' (ironmonger) of London, for a term of years which expired in 1394. This William Rumschedde was probably the boy's foster-father, and an official of Sevenoaks. On seeking admission to the city freedom he was transferred, at his request, to the Grocers' Company, as his master had not followed the trade of a 'ferrer,' but that of a grocer (City Records, Letter-book H, p. 816). His admission to the latter company was in 1397-8, and he served the office of joint master in 1405-6 (Facsimile Archives of the Grocers' Company). His name disappears from the grocers' list in 1427-8.

Sevenoke is one of the heroes in Richard Johnson's 'Nine Worthies of London,' 1592 (reprinted in the Harleian Miscellany, 1811, viii. 437-61), in which he is made to describe his career in verse. According to this chronicle he went after his apprenticeship with Henry V to his French wars, and engaged in combat with the 'Dolphyne,' who gave him 'a bag of crowns' for his prowess. He was elected as senior of the two wardens of London Bridge in 1404, but held the office, which was one of great dignity and importance, for only one year (WELSH, Hist. of the Tower Bridge, p. 263; of, p. 102). Sevenoke is described in the hustling rôle as an alderman in 1412, but no entry of his election appears in the city records until 24 May 1414, when he was elected for Tower ward (Letter-book I. f. 182). His name occurs in numerous hustling deeds from 1400 to 1415, and later, as co-trustee of various properties in the parish of his own residence, St. Dunstan-in-the-East, and in other parishes. He was elected sheriff on 21 Sept. 1412 (ib. f. 117b; cf. RILEY, Memorials, p. 695). Three years later Thomas Maynelle, a grocer and inhabitant of his ward of Tower, was brought before him for certain irregular doings. Maynelle threatened the alderman with the fate of Nicholas Brambre [q. v.] unless he was careful in his behaviour. For this he was bound over by the court of aldermen in 200l. to keep the peace (ib. pp. 606-6).

Sevenoke became mayor in 1418 (Letter-book I. f. 220 b), and took strong measures to suppress the Christmas mummers, forbidding any person to walk by night 'in any manere mommyng, pleyes, enterludes, or any other disgisynges with any feynid berdis [bsards], peyntid visers,' &c., and ordering that 'eche honest persone' should hang before his dwelling 'a lanterne with a candall therein, to brenne as long as hit may endure' (ib. f. 223). He also tried to abolish the custom among the city officials of begging for Christmas gifts, and attended as head of the city at the solemn mass held in Guildhall Chapel on 13 Oct. 1419, before the election of Richard Whittington as mayor. This custom, inaugurated in Sevenoke's mayoralty, has lasted in a modified form to the present day. On 28 Feb. 1423 Sevenoke was appointed on a commission with William Croomere, mayor, William Waldene, and John Fray to inquire into cases of treason and felony within the city, and two days later they found Sir John Mortimer guilty of having broken prison (SHARPE, London and the Kingdom, i. 269; see under MORTIMER, EDMUND II). Sevenoke was member of parliament for London in 1417, and attained great wealth as a merchant. He was buried, according to Stow, in the church of St. Martin Ludgate, where he had a monument. Three of his wills, dated 20 Dec. 1426, 17 June 1432, and 5 July 1432 respectively, were enrolled in the court of hustling in 1432-3, and dispose exclusively of real property (SHARPE, Calendar, ii. 462, 466). By a fourth will, dated 14 July 1432, he devised certain lands and tenements in the parish of Allhallowe, Barking, to the town of Sevenoaks for establishing and endowing almshouses for twenty poor people, and a freeschool for that town. The school was afterwards further endowed by Sir Ralph Bosville and others, and became a flourishing institution known as Queen Elizabeth's Grammar School. Sevenoke bore as arms azure, seven acorns or.

[Price's Historical Account of the Guildhall, pp. 180-1; Strype's Stow, 1720, bk. v. pp. 117-118; Nichols's Hist. of the Ironmongers' Company, 1866, p. 18; Stow's Survey of London; Hasted's Hist. of Kent, i. 355-6; Loftie's Hist. of London, ii. 344; Carlisle's Endowed Grammar Schools, i. 616; Heath's Account of the Grocers' Company, 1864, pp. 213-21; authorities above cited.]

O. W.-x.

SEVER, HENRY (d. 1471), first provost of Eton College and warden of Merton, was a member of Merton College, Oxford, in 1427, when he served as senior proctor in the university. He graduated D.D., and subsequently became chaplain and almoner to Henry VI. By the charter of incorporation he was on 11 Oct. 1440 appointed first provost of Eton College (Belynton Correspondence, ii. 274, 281, 286). In 1442 he was succeeded as provost by William Waynflete [q. v.], and at the end of that year he became chancellor of Oxford University. In the following year he was specially recommended by the university to the favour of Eugenius IV. On 29 May 1445 he was collated to the prebend of Harleston in St. Paul's Cathedral, and in April 1449 he became chancellor of that church. In 1440 the college presented him to the chapel of Kibworth, which he resigned soon after, and on 19 Feb. 1455-6 elected him warden of Merton College. In the reign of Edward IV Sever is said to have held fourteen ecclesiastical preferments (MAXWOOD, Alumni Eton, p. 2). He died on 6 July 1471, and was buried in the choir of Merton College chapel; a monumental brass placed over his tomb is now within the rails of the communion-table on the south side of the chancel. His will, dated 4 July 1471, is printed in 'Testamenta Eboracensia' (in. 188-90); by it Sever made many bequests to Merton College. While warden he rebuilt or completed the warden's house and the Holywell tower, probably at his own expense; these services won him the title of second founder of the college. Sever has been frequently confused with William Senhouse [q. v.], whose name was generally but erroneously spelt Sever.

[Testamenta Eboracensia (Surtees Soc.), iii. 188-90; Corresp of Belynton (Rolls Ser.); Newcourt's Repertorium, i. 113, 153; Le Neve's Fasti, ed. Hardy, ii. 360, 389, iii. 348, 467, 543; Camden et Ill. Virorum Lit. 1690, pp. 219-20, 224-5; Harwood's Alumni Etonenses; Maxwell-Lyte's Eton College, pp. 8, 18; Brodrick's Memorials of Merton, pp. 16, 160, 314.]

A. F. P.

SEVER, WILLIAM (d. 1505), bishop of Durham. [See SENHOUSE.]

SEVERN, ANN MARY (1832-1866), painter. [See NEWTON.]

SEVERN, JOSEPH (1793-1879), painter, was born at Hoxton on 7 Dec. 1793. His father, James Severn, a musician by profession, belonged to an old Gloucestershire family, reduced by misfortune; his mother, whose maiden name was Littell, was of Huguenot extraction. The boy early showed a passion for drawing, which was encouraged by his father, who possessed considerable artistic sensitiveness without much taste or knowledge. Unable either to teach his son or to procure him regular instruction, he apprenticed him to an engraver. The novice in this profession proved intolerable to young Severn, who found himself constrained to constant copying while longing to attempt original work. He contrived to find time for the execution of drawings, purchased an easel and colours with the proceeds, and managed to pick up some instruction as a casual attendant at the academy schools. While thus struggling he formed, probably in 1816, the friendship with Keats by which he is now chiefly remembered; and his connection with Keats's brother George was even more intimate. In 1817 it was announced that the Royal Academy proposed to bestow a gold medal for the best historical painting by a student, a prize which had not been awarded for twelve years owing to the lack of merit among the candidates. The subject, 'Una seizing the Dagger from the despairing Red Cross Knight' ('Faerie Queene, bk. i. canto 10), fired Severn's imagination, already powerfully stimulated by his intercourse with Keats, and, further encouraged by the commendation which Fuseli, then keeper of the academy, had bestowed upon some of his drawings, he resolved to be a competitor. He worked with the greatest determination, selling his watch and books to procure the necessary material, and, to his own and the general surprise, was declared the winner, on 10 Dec. 1818. For the time, nevertheless, his success obtained for him no substantial advantage; he found no encouragement except in miniature-painting. His more ambitious picture, 'Hermia and Helena,' though hung at the academy exhibition, attracted no attention; and the envy of disappointed rivals drove him from the academy schools. This, however, was not altogether disadvantageous in so far as it allowed him time for an increased intimacy with Leigh Hunt, Reynolds, and the other members of Keats's circle, which aided him in acquiring the culture in which he had hitherto been deficient. His friendship with Charles Armitage Brown [q. v.] became especially close. In September 1820 he formed, on the shortest notice, that generous resolution of accompanying the invalid Keats to Italy, which has fulfilled the aspiration of Shelley, that 'the spirit of his illustrious friend might plead against oblivion for his name.' It augments the honour due to Severn that his intention met with the strongest opposition from his father, who went so far as to knock him down; and that his devoted attendance on the dying Keats imperilled his prospect of obtaining a travelling pension from the Royal Academy by retarding the execution of the picture which was a necessary condition. After Keats's death on 24 Feb. 1821, Severn addressed himself to the completion of his picture, 'The Death of Alcibiades,' which after its arrival in England was long mislaid at the academy, but came to light in time to obtain for Severn not only a travelling pension of 180*l.* for three years, but the repayment of the sum he had expended in going to Rome. It must be said that the hopes which inspired this liberality were disappointed; Severn did not achieve any considerable eminence as a painter. But 'the death of Keats and my devoted friendship,' he says, 'had become a kind of passport to the English in Rome, and I soon found myself in the midst of not only the most polished society, but the most Christian in the world—I mean in the sense of humanity, of cheerfulness, of living for others rather than ourselves. This was invaluable as the introduction to my future patrons and the foundation of valuable and lasting friendships.' By friendship, patronage, and commissions from distinguished visitors to Rome, Severn prospered in the world. He painted some historical or imaginative works, such as 'Greek Shepherds,' 'The Death of Alexander,' 'Endymion,' an idealised representation of Keats; and an altar-piece from the 'Apocalypse,' placed, after great opposition, in the church of San Paolo fuori delle Mura. He also painted portraits and numerous pictures from modern Roman life, of which 'The Roman Ave Maria,' engraved in Mr. Sharp's biography, a commission from the Emperor Nicholas, now in the Imperial Gallery at St. Petersburg, is a good specimen.

He will nevertheless be best remembered, even as an artist, by his connection with Keats, whom he painted both living and from memory. Severn's best portrait—a half-length miniature—belongs to Sir Charles Dilke [see art. KEATS, JOHN]. During Severn's first residence at Rome much of his time and thoughts was occupied by tasteless designs for a monument to Keats and by ineffectual efforts to get Keats's biography written.

About 1825 Severn became enamoured of Elizabeth, daughter of Archibald, lord Montgomerie (d. 1814), a ward of the Countess of Westmorland (see under MONTGOMERIE, HUGH, twelfth EARL OF EGLINTON). The countess habitually resided in Italy, and had been one of his warmest patrons. Her violent and unreasonable opposition to the match, however, postponed it until October 1828. The marriage proved a happy one, and, although he became involved in a harassing lawsuit, his career was generally prosperous. The education of his children was probably his motive for returning to England, a step which, though planned in 1838, was not effected until 1841. The nineteen years of his English residence were uneventful, except for the zeal with which he threw himself into the Westminster Hall cartoon competition and his influence upon Milnes's 'Life of Keats.' His pictures were chiefly reminiscences of Italian scenery and manners, such as the view of the Campagna painted for Mr. Gladstone, and 'Shelley in the Coliseum,' painted for Sir Percy Shelley. He also executed an 'Ariel,' a graceful and delicate conception, engraved in Mr. Sharp's biography. He enjoyed the cordial friendship of Eastlake, George Richmond, and Mr. Ruskin; but his pictures did not find much acceptance with the public, and he came to occupy himself more and more with literature. Some specimens of his attempts at fiction are preserved in Mr. Sharp's volumes, and abundantly manifest his lack of vocation. He planned an illustrated edition of 'Adonais,' and wrote some notes towards it, but the undertaking did not proceed far. Frederic Locks-Lampson describes him in 1839 as a 'jaunty, fresh-natured, irresponsible sort of elderly being, leading a facile, slipshod, dressing-gowny, artistic existence in Pimlico' (My Confidences, p. 342).

In 1860 the British consulship at Rome became vacant by the resignation of Charles Newton, who returned to the British Museum, and shortly afterwards became Severn's son-in-law. It was probably at Newton's suggestion that Severn applied for the appointment, which he obtained, mainly by the interest of Mr. Gladstone and Bunsen. Long residence had familiarised him with the Roman social atmosphere; a further recommendation was his liberality of opinion, which, in his capacity as acting Italian as well as British consul, he evinced by frequent interpositions on behalf of persons obnoxious to the papal government. Looking and passing for a much younger man than he actually was, he retained his office with credit until 1872, when he retired on a pension. He continued to live in Rome, painting almost to the last, and died there on 3 Aug. 1879. His remains were at first interred in this new cemetery, but ultimately removed and deposited by the side of Keats. He lost no opportunity of manifesting that devotion to the memory of his friend to which he is indebted for the better part of his own celebrity.

Of Severn's six children, three, Walter, Arthur, and Ann Mary, afterwards married to Sir Charles Newton [see NEWTON, ANN MARY], became artists of note.

[The principal authority upon Severn is Mr. William Sharp's Life and Letters of Joseph Severn, 1892, drawn up from copious manuscript material. See also art. KLATS, JOHN, and the biographies of Keats by Lord Houghton and Mr. Sidney Colvin; Dilke's Papers of a Critic, i. 17; Athenæum, 1879; Dublin University Mag. vol. xvi.] R. G.

SEWALL DU BOVILL (d. 1257), archbishop of York, was a pupil at Oxford of St. Edmund (Rich), the future archbishop of Canterbury. Edmund, who was greatly attached to Sewall, is said to have foretold his friend's promotion and troubles. About 1240 Sewall became dean of York. He held the prebend of Fenton, in the same church, apparently as early as 1237. While dean he wrote to Innocent IV in support of the proposed canonisation of St Edmund (MARTEN, Theo. Nov. Anecd. iii. 1888). Some constitutions made by him as dean of York, in 1252, are in Cotton MS. Vitellius A. ii. f. iii. Previously to 16 Jan. 1250 he was made archdeacon of York. On the death of Archbishop Gray in 1255 the canons elected him to the vacant see. The king refused his consent on the ground that Sewall was of illegitimate birth. On 1 Oct. the chapter determined to prosecute an appeal at Rome; eventually the pope granted a dispensation removing the defect of birth, and confirmed the election. The king was thus compelled to give his assent on 4 May 1256, and Sewall was consecrated at York on 26 July by Walter de Cantelupe, bishop of Worcester. Shortly after his consecration, Adam de Marieco [q. v.] addressed him a long letter of advice urging him to take Bishop Grosseteste as his example (Monumenta Franciscana, pp. 438-89). The pope claimed the right to appoint to the deanery on its vacation by Sewall, and in 1257 an Italian, Jordan, was by his authority fraudulently installed. Sewall resisted the intrusion, and as a consequence was suspended from his office and excommunicated. It does not seem clear whether Sewall was absolved before his death, but the dispute was apparently compromised by the provision of a pension for Jordan. On 20 July 1257 Sewall was one of the commissioners appointed to decide the dispute between Alexander of Scotland and his nobles (Pædera, i. 362). He died on 10 May 1257 (STUBBS ap. RAIN, Historians of the Church of York, ii. 405; but MAT. PARIS, v. 691, gives the date as 2 May). He was buried in the south transept of York minster, where his tomb is marked by a marble slab bearing a cross.

Sewall's rule as archbishop was troubled by his quarrel with the pope, whom on his deathbed he summoned to judgment (ib. v. 692). But his sufferings and resistance to papal intrusion won him great popularity. Matthew Paris describes him as a humble and holy man, well skilled in law and other sciences (v. 516). Bale ascribes to him: 1. 'Breviloquium ad Alexandrum papam.' 2. 'Sermones et Epistolæ.' 3. 'Ad eos Sacerdotes.'

[Annales Monastici, Matthew Paris, Monumenta Franciscana, Raine's Historians of the Church of York (all these in Rolls Ser.); Chron. Lanercost, pp. 71-2; Bliss's Calendar of Papal Registers; Le Neve's Fasti Eccl. Angl., Tanner's Bibl. Brit.-Hib. p. 664, Dixon and Raine's Fasti Eboracenses, pp. 295-9.] C. L. K.

SEWALL, SAMUEL (1652-1730), colonist and judge, son of Henry Sewall and Jane, daughter of Stephen Dummer, was born at Bishopstoke, Hampshire, on 28 March 1652. Emigrating in childhood with his parents to Newbury, Massachusetts, he was educated at a private school and at Harvard, entering in 1667, and graduating B.A. in 1671 and M.A. in 1674. He was then ordained minister, but on his marriage in 1677 was induced to leave that calling, and, under the patronage of his father-in-law, started a printing-press at Boston. He soon became known in public life, and in 1684 was elected a member of the court of assistants for Massachusetts. In 1688 he came to England on business. In 1692 Sewall, as a justice of the peace, was concerned in adjudicating in the Salem witchcraft case, but afterwards bitterly repented of his share in the proceedings, and publicly announced the fact, henceforward spending one day annually in fasting and prayer. He afterwards became one of the regular judges of Massachusetts, and in 1718 chief justice. He retired in 1728, and died at Boston on 1 Jan. 1730.

Sewall married, on 28 Feb. 1676, Hannah, daughter of John Hull and Judith Quincy. He left a long line of descendants, the 'loyalist' branch of which changed the spelling of the name to 'Sewell' [see under SEWELL, JONATHAN]. Sewall's diary, an interesting and valuable source for the social history of the colony from 1674 to 1729, was first published in the 'Collections of the Massachusetts Historical Society,' 5th ser. vol. v. An engraving, from a supposed original portrait (date and artist unknown), forms the frontispiece. Sewall was also author of a pamphlet against slavery, entitled 'The Selling of Joseph' (1700).

[Swall's Letters and Diaries; Appleton's Cyclopædia of American Biography.]

O. A. H.

SEWARD, ANNA (1747-1809), authoress, known as the 'Swan of Lichfield,' born in 1747 at Eyam, Derbyshire, was elder daughter of Thomas Seward [q. v.] Her mother was Elizabeth, daughter of the Rev. John Hunter, headmaster of Lichfield grammar school and the teacher of Dr. Johnson. Anna early developed literary tastes, and her father declared that she could repeat passages from 'L'Allegro' before she was three. In 1754 her father removed to Lichfield, where Anna resided for the rest of her life. There she became acquainted with Dr. Erasmus Darwin [q. v.], and he encouraged her to write poetry.

In June 1764 her sister Sarah died when on the eve of marriage with Mr. Porter, Dr. Johnson's stepson. It would seem that he had thought of the elder sister before the younger (cf. Poetical Works, vol. i. pp. cxix-cxxi), and that after Sarah's death he wished to renew his addresses to Anna. But his advances were not encouraged. The gap left in her affections by the death of her sister was filled by Honora Sneyd, whom Mr. and Mrs. Seward adopted. Miss Sneyd became in 1773 Richard Lovell Edgeworth's second wife.

Henceforth Anna devoted herself mainly to her father (her mother died in 1780). Her leisure was spent in literary work, social duties, and in a voluminous correspondence with literary friends. She refused all offers of marriage. But she was at one time engaged to a 'Colonel T.' (cf. Letters, iv. 175-180), and in later life formed an attachment for John Saville, vicar-choral of Lichfield Cathedral (cf. NICHOLS, Illustr. of Lit. viii. 427). When he died in 1803 she erected a monument to his memory in the cathedral.

Miss Seward's earliest poems appeared under the auspices of Anna, lady Miller [q. v.] in the 'Bathaston Miscellany.' Among them are an 'Elegy on the Death of Mr. Garrick' and an 'Ode on Ignorance.' In 1781 she published a 'Monody on the unfortunate Major André,' which was republished, with another popular elegiac effort on Captain Cook, in 1817. In 1782 she published 'Louisa: a poetical novel.' It was well received, won Hayley's admiration, and passed through five editions. About this time Miss Seward visited Hayley in Sussex, and there met Romney, who in 1786 painted her portrait. For some time the picture remained in Hay-ley's possession, but in 1788 Romney seems to have presented it to Miss Seward's father (cf. HAYLEY, Memoirs, i. 277; SEWARD, Letters, ii. 126). Miss Seward addressed a poem to Romney on the subject. In 1786 she paid one of her rare visits to London, and writes of 'literary breakfastings' at the house of Helen Maria Williams [q. v.], and of Mrs. Siddons's performance of Rosalind, which did not please her. Next year she made the acquaintance of Mr. and Mrs. Piozzi [q. v.], and frequently met at Lichfield Dr. Darwin, Thomas Day, Richard Lovell Edgeworth, Dr. Parr, Howard the prison reformer, and Dr. Johnson. The last she cordially disliked (cf. NICHOLS, Illustr. of Lit. vii. 321-63). About 1776 Miss Seward first met Boswell, whom she subsequently supplied with particulars concerning Johnson. Boswell, who knew her prejudice against Johnson, offended her by a somewhat cool reception of her statements (cf. HILL, Boswell, ii. 407; Gent. Mag. 1793, i. 197 et passim). Miss Seward published letters signed 'Benfolio,' decrying Johnson in the 'Gentleman's Magazine' in 1786 and 1793 (cf. Gent. Mag. 1786 i. 125-6, 302-4, 1787 ii. 684-5).

In March 1790 her father died, leaving her mistress of an independent fortune of 400*l.* a year. She continued to occupy her father's residence, the bishop's palace, Lichfield.

On the appearance of the first and second volumes of Scott's 'Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border,' in 1802, Miss Seward wrote to Scott warmly commending it. Despite the pedantry of her style he recognised her 'sound sense and vigorous ability.' She sent him a Scottish ballad of her own manufacture, 'Rich auld Willie's Farewell,' and Scott placed it among the 'imitations' which form a section of the 'Border Minstrelsy.' He relates that Miss Seward, whom he had never seen, sent him a long and passionate epistle on the death of a dear friend whom he had likewise never seen, but conjured him on no account to answer the letter since she was dead to the world. 'Never were commands more literally obeyed,' wrote Scott to Joanna Baillie. 'I remained as silent as the grave, till the lady made so many enquiries after me that I was afraid of my death being prematurely announced by a sonnet or an elegy.' In 1807 Scott paid Miss Seward a visit at Lichfield, and she greatly interested him. She characterised the meeting as 'among the high-prized honours which my writings have procured for me.'

In 1799 Miss Seward published a collection of original sonnets intended to restore the strict rules of the sonnet. She handled the form with some measure of success. Leigh Hunt especially admired the sonnet entitled 'December Morning,' 1782 (Men, Women, and Books, ii. 141).

Miss Seward published in 1804 a 'Memoir of Dr. Darwin,' which she dedicated to the Earl of Carlisle. It consists chiefly of anecdotes of the early part of Darwin's life, and of the society at Lichfield while he lived there. Miss Seward lays claim to the verses that form the exordium of Darwin's poem, 'The Botanic Garden.' Miss Seward, it seems, had sent the lines to him in July 1778, and they were forwarded without her knowledge to the 'Gentleman's Magazine,' with an alteration in the concluding lines (cf. Letters, ii. 311-13, iii. 155-6, v. 333-4). Robert Anderson denied the truth of this assertion (cf. NICHOLS, Illustr. of Lit. vii. 215-16). Two years after Darwin's death the lines appeared under Miss Seward's name in Shaw's 'History of Staffordshire,' 1798 (p. 34). Miss Seward's 'Memoir of Darwin' was severely condemned in the 'Edinburgh Review,' and she wrote to Scott of the editor, 'Jeffreys ought to have been his name' (SMILES, A Publisher and his Friends, i. 92).

After 1804 her health began to fail. In 1807 she was attacked by a scorbutic disorder, and she died on 26 March 1809. She was buried in the cathedral at Lichfield, where she had erected a monument, the work of the sculptor Bacon, to her father's memory. It commemorates the whole of the Seward family. The lines on it to Anna's memory are by Scott.

Miss Seward was a tall handsome woman with regular features and an animated expression. Scott says that 'her eyes were auburn, of the precise shade and hue of her hair, and possessed great expression.' Hayley described her as 'a handsome likeness of those full-length pictures of Queen Elizabeth, where the painters gave her majesty all the beauty they could, consistent with the character of her face' (HAYLEY, Memoirs, i. 244). She had a melodious voice, and, according to Hayley, read aloud 'with peculiar force and propriety.' In conversation she had great command of literary anecdote (cf. NICHOLS, Lit. Anecd. ix. 381). Southey declared that, 'with all her affectation,' there was 'a very likeable warmth and sincerity about her' (Correspondence of Southey and C. Bowles, p. 319). She held tolerant religious views, and was a liberal in politics. She sympathised with the French revolution: 'I was educated in whiggism,' she wrote to Dr. Parr in 1793.

Miss Seward bequeathed her literary works and remains to Scott, and her letters (twelve quarto manuscript volumes) to Archibald Constable, the Edinburgh publisher. By her request, Scott edited her posthumous compositions, and in 1810 published the poetical works in three volumes, prefixing a memoir, by himself, with extracts from her letters. She had asked Scott to perform a like office for the whole of her literary correspondence, but he declined 'on principle,' because he had 'a particular aversion to perpetuating that sort of gossip.' The matter was therefore left in the hands of Constable, who published in 1811 the letters written between 1784 and 1807 in six volumes. With Constable's consent, Scott examined the manuscript and struck out the extravagant utterances relating to himself and his work. The book had a certain vogue, for in 1813 appeared 'The Beauties of Anna Seward,' selected and arranged by W. O. Oulton. Another edition appeared in 1832, and has for frontispiece an engraving by Woolnoth of the Romney portrait.

Miss Seward's poetry belongs to the school represented by William Hayley [q. v.], and satirised by Gifford in the 'Baviad' (cf. STEPHEN, Thought in the Eighteenth Century, ii. 457). Her work abounds in every sort of affectation. Horace Walpole found that she had 'no imagination, no novelty.' He classed her with Helen Williams and 'a half a dozen more of those harmonious virgins' whose 'thoughts and phrases are like their gowns, old remnants cut and turned' (WALPOLE, Letters, ed. Cunningham, ix. 73). Miss Mitford described her as 'all tinkling and tinsel—a sort of Dr. Darwin in petticoats' (Letters, 2nd ser. ed. Chorley, i. 28). Scott was a far more indulgent critic, but he was good-natured to a fault, and was perhaps flattered as a young man by the attentions of a poetess (cf. LOCKHART, Scott, 1 vol. ed. pp. 188, 201). Johnson remarked to Boswell (25 June 1784) that there was nothing equal to Miss Seward's description of the sea round the North Pole in her elegy on Captain Cook (HILL, Boswell, iv. 331), for which Hayley was believed to be in part responsible (cf. NICHOLS, Illustr. of Lit. vii. 216). Darwin called her the inventress of epic elegy (cf. POLWHELE, Unsex'd Females, p. 33). At times she shows an appreciation of natural scenery, and now and then turns a good line (cf. LEIGH HUNT, Men, Women, and Books, ii. 141). Of her epitaphs, that on Gilbert Walmsley [q. v.] is inscribed on his tomb in Lichfield Cathedral (HILL, Boswell, i. 81 n.); another, on Garrick, was intended for his monument in the same place, but the sculptor neglected to leave space for it. The third volume of the poems contains paraphrases and imitations of Horace, although she knew no Latin. In 1788 she wrote a sermon for a young clergyman, who preached it, and it was probably not the sole composition of the kind she attempted (cf. Gent. Mag. 1801, i. 118, 195, 398).

Besides the portrait by Romney, already mentioned, which seems to have been engraved both by Woolnath and Ridley, Miss Seward sat for a miniature to Smart in 1771 and to Miers in 1777. A portrait painted in 1762 by Kettle, and engraved by Cardon, forms a frontispiece to the first volume of the letters, and was in 1811 in the possession of Thomas White of Lichfield.

[Scott's memoir, prefixed to the poems, 1810; Miss Seward's Letters, 6 vols. 1811; A Swan and her Friends, by E. V. Lucas, 1907; authorities cited.] E. L.

SEWARD, THOMAS (1708-1790), canon of Lichfield and of Salisbury, son of John Seward of Badsey, Worcestershire, born in 1708, was admitted a foundation scholar of Westminster school in 1728. He was elected by the school to scholarships at Christ Church, Oxford, and Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1727, but upon his rejection by both universities he became a pensioner of St. John's College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1730 and M.A. in 1734; then he became travelling tutor to Lord Charles Fitzroy, third son of the Duke of Grafton, who died while on the tour in Italy in 1739 (cf. WALPOLE, Letters, ed. Cunningham, viii. 415). The Duke of Grafton subsequently promised some preferment for Seward. He became rector of Eyam, Derbyshire, and Kingsley, Staffordshire. He also obtained the prebend of Bubbenhall in the church of Lichfield, though the date of his admission does not appear, and on 30 April 1755 he was collated to the prebend of Pipa Parva in the same church. He was installed in the prebend of Lyme and Halstock in the church of Salisbury on 5 June 1755. He resided at Lichfield from 1754, and was acquainted with Dr. Johnson, whom he used to entertain on his visits to Lichfield. Boswell describes him as a great valetudinarian, and 'a genteel, well-bred, dignified clergyman, who had lived much in the great world.' In 1779 he was portrayed as the Canon in the novel 'Columella,' by Richard Graves (1715-1804) [q. v.] He died at the bishop's palace, Lichfield, on 4 March 1790. He married Elizabeth, daughter of the Rev. John Hunter, headmaster of Lichfield grammar school, and was father of Anna Seward [q. v.], the authoress, who caused a monument to be erected to her parents in Lichfield Cathedral. The monument was executed by Bacon, and the verses which form part of the epitaph were the composition of Sir Walter Scott. His portrait, painted by Wright of Derby, was engraved by Cromel for Miss Seward's 'Letters,' vol. ii.

Seward edited, in conjunction with Symson, the 'Works' of Beaumont and Fletcher, and wrote the preface, 10 vols. London, 1750, 8vo. It was a poor performance: Coleridge exclaimed in his 'Lectures on Shakespears' (p. 146): 'Mr. Seward! Mr. Seward! you may be, and I trust you are, an angel, but you were an ass!' 'The Female Right to Literature' and four other poems by Seward were printed in Dodsley's 'Collection,' ii. 296-308 (cf. Gent. Mag. 1780, p. 128). Seward also published: 1. 'The Conformity between Popery and Paganism,' London, 1746, 8vo [cf. MIDDLETON, CONYERS]. 2. A curious sermon, preached at Lichfield in 1758, entitled 'The late dreadful Earthquakes no proof of God's particular Wrath against the Portuguese.'

[Boswell's Johnson, ed. Hill; Gent. Mag. 1790 i. 280, 369; Graduati Cantabr.; Le Neve's Fasti, ed. Hardy, i. 588, 621, ii. 672; Nichols's Illustr. of Lit.; Nichols's Lit. Anecd.; Welch's Alumni Westmon., ed. Phillimore, pp. 281, 296.]

T. C.

SEWARD, WILLIAM (1747-1799), man of letters, the only son of William Seward (partner in the firm of Calvert & Seward, then the chief brewers of beer in London), was born in January 1747. When very young he was trained at a small seminary near Cripplegate, and he is said to have been at Harrow school in December 1757 (THORNTON, Harrow School, pp. 136-8). For a time he was at Charterhouse school, and on 4 June 1764 he matriculated from Oriel College, Oxford. As he was possessed of considerable property and had no taste for trade, he declined, to his father's dismay, to continue in the family business.

On quitting the university Seward travelled on the continent, particularly in Italy, and then returned to London with a confirmed love of literature and the fine arts, and a pronounced tendency to hypochondria. He invariably spent the winter in London and the summer in the country (BURNEY, Memoirs, iii. 265). He was a great favourite in the house of the Thrales at Streatham, where Dr. Johnson often met him. To Johnson's rooms in London he was a frequent visitor, and he was among the friends that attended the doctor's funeral. Parr consulted him on Johnson's epitaph, and Seward made a suggestion which was adopted. With letters of recommendation from Johnson to Boswell he visited Edinburgh and the highlands in 1777. In August 1781 he made the 'western tour' in England, calling in every town on 'a doctor, apothecary, or chemist,' about his health, and extracting at the same time information about the place and its surroundings. Two years later (June 1783) he was going to Paris and then to Flanders, to study the pictures of Claude Lorraine. Miss Seward, an old acquaintance but no relation, met him at Buxton in June 1793.

Seward was a member of the Eumeleian Club that met at the Blenheims tavern in Bond Street, and of the Essex Club founded by Dr. Johnson early in 1784. He was elected F.R.S. on 11 Feb. 1779 and F.S.A. on 25 March 1779. He died of a dropsy at his lodgings, Dean Street, Soho, on 24 April 1799, and was buried in the family vault at Finchley on 1 May. His portrait was painted by George Dance on 5 May 1793, and engraved by William Daniell. A second portrait of him, by J. G. Wood, was engraved by Holl, and published on 3 June 1799.

Seward was 'in action all benevolence.' In the 'Poems of Mrs. John Hunter' (2nd edit. 1803, pp. 74-5) is an elegy in praise of his benevolence. He did not 'disdain' Tom Paine, and he subscribed ten guineas towards purchasing an annuity for Porson (WATSON, Life of Porson, p. 99). While doing good to every one, he spoke well of nobody, yet he could be, when he chose, a piquant and stimulating conversationalist. Miss Burney, who made his acquaintance in 1777, had always 'a true esteem for him,' as his pretence of affectation and his spirit of satire waned but 'quizziness' (cf. CLAYDEN, Early Life of Rogers, pp. 168-74).

Many articles, including a series of 'Reminiscences,' were supplied by Seward to the 'Whitehall Evening Post,' and he contributed anecdotes and literary discoveries to Cadell's 'Repository' and the 'European Magazine.' His papers of 'Droseiana,' in the 'European Magazine,' beginning in October 1789, p. 243, formed the basis of his anonymous 'Anecdotes of some Distinguished Persons' (1795-7), 5 vols., which passed into a fifth edition in four volumes in 1804. This was followed in 1799 by two volumes of 'Biographiana.' These works showed much reading and were deservedly popular. Mathias in the 'Pursuits of Literature' (2nd dialogue, lines 61 and 62), speaks of Seward as a 'publick bagman for scraps,' but in a note describes the volumes as 'very entertaining but very dear,' and their author as the best 'compiler of anecdotes except Horace Walpole.'

[Foster's Alumni Oxon.; European Mag. October 1799, pp. 219-20 (by Isaac Reed, and with engraved portrait); Gent. Mag. 1799, i. 439-40; Monthly Mag. 1799, p. 334; Memoirs of Dr. Burney, ii. 87-9, 164; Early Diary of F. Burney, ii. 153; Madame d'Arblay's Diary, i. 140-1, 178, 226, 231-3, 426, ii. 66, 71, 88-9, 95, 233-4, iv. 173-4, vi. 187; Nichols's Lit. Anecd. ii. 553, 638, iii. 399, ix. 487; Goldsmith's Works, ed. Gibbs, v. 412-14; Anna Seward's Letters, iii. 265-8, iv. 63-8; Hayward's Piozzi, ii. 75; Boswell, ed. Hill, ii. 337, iii. 123, iv. 198, 423, 445; Johnson's Letters, ed. Hill, i. 346, ii. 33, 35, 299, 434.] W. P. O.

SEWARD, WILLIAM WENMAN (J. 1800), writer on Irish politics and topography, published at Dublin: 1. 'The Rights of the People asserted, and the Necessity of a more equal Representation in Parliament stated and proved,' &c., 1783, 8vo (a fervidly patriotic effusion, dedicated to 'the Volunteers of Ireland,' displaying, however, considerable knowledge of political and constitutional history). 2. 'The Hibernian Gazetteer,' 1789, 12mo. 3. 'Topographia Hibernica . . . giving a Complete View of the Civil and Ecclesiastical State of the country: arranged alphabetically, with Appendices,' 1796, 4to; it is dedicated to William Robert, duke of Leinster, and has for frontispiece an engraving of the Round Tower of Roscrea, Tipperary; for the ancient topography, Archdall and Ledwich were followed; a copy in the British Museum (interleaved) has manuscript notes by the author; among these is an alphabetical list of the English adventurers in Ireland during the first English invasion, under Henry II; the book is described in Peel's 'Bibliotheca Hibernica' as 'a valuable topographical dictionary.' 4. 'Collectanea Politica; or the Political Transactions of Ireland, 1760-1803,' 1808, 8vo (the British Museum has no copy).

[Seward's Works; Allibone's Dict. Engl. Lit. ii. 2000.] G. L. G. N.

SEWEL, WILLIAM (1654-1720), Quaker historian, son of Jacob Williamson Sewel, a free citizen and surgeon of Amsterdam, was born there in 1654. His paternal grandfather, William Sewel, a Brownist of Kidderminster, emigrated from England to escape religious persecution, and married a native of Utrecht. His mother, Judith Zinspenning, daughter of a German papist, afterwards a baptist, was a woman of strong character. She joined the Quakers in 1657, after hearing William Amee (d. 1662) [q.v.], became an eloquent minister, visited England in 1663, was author of 'A Serious Reproof to the Flsmish Baptists,' 1660, a 'Book of Proverbs' (translated into English by William Caton [q. v.], London, 1663), 'An Epistle' (Sewall, Hist. ii. 125-8), and other small books. She died at Amsterdam on 10 Sept. 1664, aged 34. Her husband predeceased her.

Sewel was brought up by an uncle. At eight he was fairly proficient in Latin (Crisp and his Correspondents, p. 59), but was soon apprenticed to a weaver, and pursued his study of languages in the intervals of throwing the shuttle. At fourteen he visited his mother's friends in England. Returning to Holland after a sojourn of ten months, he obtained work as a translator, contributed regularly to the 'Amsterdam Courant' and other papers, wrote verses, and conducted a periodical. In spite of an invitation from William Penn to become master of the quaker school opened at Bristol, Sewel remained in Amsterdam until his death on 13 March 1720. He was married, and had issue. A portrait, by Rademaker, engraved by De Later, is in the 'Boekzaal der geleerde Wereld,' 1705; another engraving, by J. O. Philipps, forms the frontispiece of both the first and second editions of his dictionary.

Sewel spent twenty-five years in preparing his principal work, 'The History of the Rise, Increase, and Progress of the Christian People called Quakers.' It was first published in Dutch, 'Histori van de Opkumpste, Aanwas en Voortgang der Christenen bekend by den naam van Quakers,' Amsterdam, 1717, fol. (another edition, 1742). The English edition (London, 1722, fol.), dedicated to George I, although described by its author as 'rudis indigestaque moles,' is remarkable as the product of a writer who had only spent ten months in England. It was largely undertaken to correct the misrepresentations of 'Historia Quakeriana' (Amsterdam, 1695, 8vo; English translation, London, 1696, 8vo, by Gerard Croese, a German, to whom Sewel had himself given many letters and narratives from England). Sewel's work was based upon a mass of correspondence, George Fox's 'Journal,' and, for the public history, Olarendon's 'Rebellion' and Ludlow's 'Memoirs.' Its accuracy has never been impugned, and it remains a classical authority. The 'History' was reprinted, London, 1725, fol. 1795, 8vo, 2 vols. 1779-80, 1811, and 6th ed. 1834. American editions appeared at Philadelphia, 1728, fol. and 1832 (of HILDBURN's Issues of the Philadelphia Press, i. 92-3), Burlington, New Jersey, 1774; and New York, 1844, 2 vols. (with a life of the author). It was translated into German, 'Die Geschichte von dem Ursprung,' 1742, fol., and abridged for children, London, 1864, 16mo.

Sewel's other works are: 1. 'A Large Dictionary of English-Dutch,' 2 pts. Amsterdam, 1691, 4to; 5th ed. 1754; 6th, 1768. 2. 'A Compendious Guide to the Low Dutch Language' (English and Dutch), Amsterdam, 1700, 12mo; other editions, 1725, 1740, 1747, 1760-86. These two were reprinted together, 1708, 4to. It was reissued by S. H. Wilcocks, London, 1793, 8vo, who in pruning Sewel's 'exuberant diffusiveness' discards the illustrative phrases which are a great feature of his work. 3. 'Oratio in Luxum' (Latin and Dutch), 1715, 4to.

Sewel edited the 'Grammaire Hollandoise of Philippe la Grue,' 1744, 3rd ed. 1763, 4th, 1785, and translated the following into Dutch from the English: Robert Boyle's 'Disquisition about the final causes of Natural Things,' 1688; Penn's 'No Cross, no Crown,' 10-7, 12mo, and his 'Good Advice to the Church of England,' &c., 1687, 4to; Bishop Burnet's 'Short History of the Reformation of the Church of England,' 1690; Steven Crisp's 'Way to the Kingdom of Heaven,' 1695, 8vo; William Dampier's 'New Voyage round the World,' The Hague, 1698-1700 (Leyden, 1707, 1737), the rare and curious account of shipwreck, entitled 'God's Protecting Providence,' &c., Philadelphia, 1699 (2nd edit. London, 1700; 7th edit. 1790), of Jonathan Dickinson (d. 1722). From the Latin: Basil Kennett's 'Romæ Antiquæ Notitia,' published in Seine's 'Beschryving van Oud en Nieuw Rome,' 1704, fol.; and the works of Josephus, 1722, fol. From French, David Martin's 'Histoire du Vieux et du Nouveau Testament,' 1700; and from the German, Gottfried Arnold's 'Wahre Abbildung der ersten Christen,' 1700, fol.; another edition, 1703. He also translated into Dutch, Matthew Prior's 'Ode on King William's Arrival in Holland,' 1695, 4to.

[Sewel's Hist. of the Rise, &c., preface; Memoirs of J. Kendall, p. 162; Friends' Biographical Catalogue of Portraits, p. 599; Steven's Hist. of the Scottish Church, Rotterdam, p. 272; Wagenaar's Amsterdam, xi. 326; Chalmers's Biogr. Dict. xvii. 361; Van der Aa's Biogr. Woordenboek, xvii. 635; Gent. Mag. July 1785, p. 504, where he is called Dr. Seveley, and June 1812, p. 531; Friends' Monthly Mag. ii. 146; British Friend, December 1860, p. 294; the present writer's Crisp and his Correspondents, pp. xi, xxxiii, l. 5, 8, 26, 47, 59; Smith's Cat. of Friends' Books, ii. 560, 979; Story's Journal, p. 490; Delvenne's Biogr. du Royaume des Pays-Bas, iv. 405; Friends' Quarterly Mag. and Review, 1832, pp. 117-19, where letters from Sewel to John Penington are printed. The Meeting for Suffering owns a bound quarto manuscript volume in Sewel's autograph containing copies of his letters in Latin to William Ponn, Thomas Elwood, Theodore Eccleston, Bishop Gilbert Burnet, Gerard Croese, Josiah Martin, Christopher Meidel, and many other persons, the last dated August 1719.] C. F. S.

SEWELL, GEORGE (d. 1728), controversialist and hack-writer, born at Windsor, was the eldest son of John Sewell, treasurer and chapter-clerk to the dean and canons of Windsor, and was descended from the ancient family of Sewell living at Great Henny in Essex. He was educated at Eton, and his poem of 'The Favourite, a simile,' embodies reminiscences of his Eton life (cf. SOUTHEY, Later Poets, i. 253-4). He then went to Peterhouse, Cambridge, and graduated B.A. in 1709; for a time he studied medicine under Boerhaave at the university of Leyden, and about July 1725 he took the degree of M.D. at Edinburgh.

Sewell practised at first in London, but without success. He then retired to Hampstead, where he met with better fortune, until three other physicians came to the same place, and ruined his practice. Under the pressure of want he became a bookseller's hack, publishing numerous poems, translations, and political and other pamphlets. He died of consumption at Hampstead, in great poverty, on 8 Feb. 1725-6. On 12 Feb. he was accorded a pauper's funeral. His pathetic verses, prophetic of his death, are cited in Campbell's 'Specimens of the British Poets' (1841, p. 345).

In early life Sewell inclined to toryism, and was a bitter critic of Bishop Burnet, whom he attacked in five pamphlets (1713-1715). His animosity extended to the bishop's son, and he brought out anonymously in 1715 a satirical 'True Account of the Life and Writings of Thomas Burnet.' Sewell also wrote in the tory interest 'Remarks upon a Pamphlet intituled [Observations upon the State of the Nation]' (anon.) 1718 (3rd edit., 1714); and 'Schism destructive of the Government: a Defence of the Bill for preventing the Growth of Schism;' 2nd edit. 1714, in which he answered the arguments of Sir Richard Steele. Afterwards he attached himself to the cause of Sir Robert Walpole, and issued 'The Resigners vindicated: by a Gentleman,' 1718, which went through four editions in that year, and was succeeded by 'The Resigners, Part ii. and last,' 1718.

Sewell's best-known production in general literature was his 'Tragedy of Sir Walter Raleigh, as it is acted at the Theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields,' 1719; 5th edit. with a new scene (and prefatory verses from Amhurst and others), 1722; 6th edit. 1745. The author traded on the national hatred of Spain, Quin played the part of the hero in this piece, which was produced on 16 Jan. 1718-1719, and was often repeated. It was revived for one night at Drury Lane, 14 Dec. 1789 (Notes and Queries, 3rd ser. ii. 412).

Sewell contrived to link his name with those of many illustrious writers of this period. Verses by him are in Prior's 'Collection of Poems,' 1709 (cf. Poems of Prior, 1742, pp. xlvii-1; cf. ii. 75). He twice defended Addison's 'Cato,' in pamphlets issued in 1718 and 1718 (cf. JOHNSON, Lives, ed. Cunningham, ii. 139). He wrote the preface for Addison's 'Miscellanies in Verse and Prose,' 1725, which include two translations by him (viz. the 'Puppet-show,' pp. 20-4, and 'The Barometer,' pp. 29-32). A copy of verses by him was added to 'Sir Richard Steele's Recantation' (ARTKIN, Steele, ii. 74). Sewell bore a principal part in the fifth volume of the 'Tatler,' sometimes called 'The spurious Tatler,' which was edited by William Harrison, and in the ninth or 'spurious' volume of the 'Spectator.' He wrote a 'Life and Character of Mr. John Philips, author of 'The Splendid Shilling'' (2nd edit. 1715; 3rd edit. 1720), which was also issued with the works of Philips, and down to 1780 was often reprinted. To Pope's edition of Shakespeare (1725) Sewall added a seventh volume, containing 'Venus and Adonis, Tarquin and Lucrece, Miscellany Poems, Essay on the Stage, Glossary and remarks on the Plays.' The same pieces formed the eighth volume of a Dublin edition issued in 1725 and 1726, and the tenth volume of a London edition in 1728. It was perhaps in consequence of this unsolicited contribution that Pope, in the first edition of his 'Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot,' wrote of 'Sanguine Sew—' (line 184), which was afterwards altered to 'Slashing Bentley' (Works, ed. Courthope, iii. 254). To George Cheyne's 'History of Himself' (1743, pp. 44-49) was added Sewell's account of Archibald Pitcairne, of whose 'medical dissertation' Sewell issued a translation with J. T. Desaguliers in 1717. He assisted in the translation of Ovid's 'Metamorphoses' (1717), which was projected in opposition to that of Garth, although Sewell addressed the latter 'as his dear friend' in a poem in his 'New Collection' (anon.), 1720. He contributed to, and probably supervised, a volume of 'Sacred Miscellanies' (circa 1718), and he prepared in 1717 a very bad edition of the 'Poems of Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey' (NICHOLS, Lit. Anecdotes, viii. 301, 304; POPE, Works, ed. Courthope, v. 208).

Others of his publications in general literature were: 1. 'The Patriot: a Poem. Inscribed to Robert, Earl of Oxford,' 1719; in his 'Posthumous Works' (1728) the name of the representative patriot was changed to Walpole. 2. 'An Epistle from Sempronius to Cethegus, with Reply' (anon.), 1718: a satire on the Duke and Duchess of Marlborough. 3. 'The Proclamation of Cupid, or a Defence of Women: a Poem from Chaucer,' 1718, reprinted in No. 5 infra. 4. 'Poems on several Occasions,' 1719. 5. 'A new Collection of original Poems' (anon.), 1720. 6. Posthumous Works, viz. 'Tragedy of King Richard I,' 'Essays and Poems,' 1728; edited by his brother, Gregory Sewell. Some of his poems are inserted in Nichols's 'Collection,' vii. 133-49, and in Bell's 'Fugitive Poetry,' vi. 111-15. Long letters to and from him are in the correspondence of John Dennis (1721), i. 122-5, and in the works of Aaron Hill (1753), i. 9-19, ii. 406-13 (cf. Notes and Queries, 2nd ser. ii. 423).

[Jacob's Poetical Register, i. 177-8, 328; Park's Hampstead, pp. 323-7; Brit. Essayists, ed. Chalmers, vol. i, p. lxxxi, vol. v, p. lxxii; Cibber's Lives of the Poets, iv. 188-91; Halkett and Laing's Dict. of Anon. Lit. ii. 1245, 1716, iii. 2158, 2184, iv. 2660.] W. P. O.

SEWELL, HENRY (1807-1879), first premier of New Zealand, was the fourth son of Thomas Sewell, a solicitor, who was steward of the Isle of Wight, and of Jane, youngest daughter of John Edwards, curate of Newport. Richard Clarke Sewell (1803-1864) [q. v.], Dr. Jamee Edward Sewell, and William Sewell (1805-1874) [q. v.] were his brothers, and Elizabeth Missing Sewell, the novelist, his sister. He was born at Newport on 14 Sept. 1807, and educated at Hyde Abbey school, near Winchester. He qualified as a solicitor, and joined his father's firm in 1826, living first in Newport and then at Pidford. He moved to Brockhurst, but, on the death of his first wife in 1844, went to reside in London, where he interested himself in the Cantsbury Association for the Colonisation of New Zealand, ultimately becoming secretary and deputy chairman in 1850.

At the end of 1852 Sewell was sent out to New Zealand to wind up the affairs of the association. Arriving in February 1853, he settled at Lyttelton (whence he afterwards moved to Nelson), and commenced practice as a solicitor. In May 1854 he was elected to the House of Representatives as member for Christchurch, and from June to August was in the Fitzgerald ministry. He became on 7 May 1856 the first premier on the introduction of responsible government, but on 13 May he resigned because the crown declined to allow the ministry full responsibility. On 2 June 1856 he joined the first Stafford ministry as colonial treasurer and commissioner of customs, and held office till April 1859. From 12 July 1861 to August 1862 he was attorney-general in the Fox ministry, in December 1861 giving up his seat in this House of Representatives, and becoming member of the legislative council for Wellington; he continued as attorney-general under Alfred Domett [q. v.] till January 1863. He was minister of justice in Sir A. Weld's first ministry from 24 Nov. 1864 to 16 Oct. 1865, and again under Sir J. Fox from 28 June 1869 to 10 Sept. 1872. For his action in joining this government he was violently attacked in the lower house, and on 17 Oct. 1872 made a long and characteristic personal explanation in the council (New Zealand Debates, xii. 733). Thus for more than ten years Sewell was one of the most active and prominent of New Zealand politicians (cf. GIBBONSD).

Sewell left New Zealand in the spring of 1876, and went to reside at Romford, Essex, where his eldest son was curate. His moved to Salisbury Villa, Station Road, Cambridge, where he died on 14 May 1879. He was buried at Wareley, Huntingdonshire.

Sewell married first, on 15 May 1834, Lucinda Marianne, eldest daughter of General William Nedham of Mount Olive, Jamaica, and Widcombe, Bath, M.P. for Athenry in the last Irish parliament, 1798-1800) (she died, 28 July 1844, leaving six children); secondly, on 23 Jan. 1850, Elizabeth (d. 1880), second daughter of Capt. Edward Kittoe, R.N., of Deal.

Sewell was author of 'A Letter to Lord Worsley on the Burdens affecting Real Property,' 1846; of 'Thoughts on the Relations of Men to the External World,' 1848, and of pamphlets on New Zealand politics.

[Private information gathered by Mr. M. C. Owen, also from Miss E. M. Sewell; Mennell's Dict. of Australasian Biography; Gisborne's New Zealand Rulers and Statesmen.] C. A. H.

SEWELL, JONATHAN (1766-1839), chief justice of Lower Canada, son of Jonathan Sewell (1728-1796), the last attorney-general of Massachusetts, was born at Cambridge, Massachusetts, in June 1766, in the 'old family mansion,' came over to England with his parents, and was educated at Bristol grammar school. In 1785 he went with his father to New Brunswick and studied law in the office of Ward Chipman, going to Quebec in 1789, where he was called to the bar of Lower Canada on 30 Oct. 1789. In 1793 he became solicitor-general, and in 1795 attorney-general and advocate-general; about the same time he entered the House of Assembly as member for William Henry, for which he sat through three parliaments, till in 1808 he became chief justice of Quebec, speaker of the legislative council, and president of the executive council.

One of his earliest acts as chief justice produced a remarkable episode in Canadian history. In 1809 he introduced rules of practice into the procedure of the courts. In 1811 they were attacked by the assembly, under the leadership of James Stuart (1780-1858) [q. v.], as a breach of privilege by law-making and as affecting the liberty of the subject. Sewell was impeached for subverting the constitution, and charged with malicious influence over the governor, leading to various specified acts which covered the whole range of conflict between the house and the government under Sir James Henry Craig [q. v.], the press cases, the Bedard case, and the John Henry scandal. Monk, chief justice of Montreal, was joined in the indictment. The new governor, Sir George Prevost (1767-1816) [q. v.], tried to bring the assembly to reason and incurred its wrath. Sewell went to England to defend himself, and was by its order in 1815 restored to his post. It was clear to the home government that the action of the assembly was due to political and religious animosity which had probably been inflamed by Sewell's sarcasm and indifference; but Sir John Coape Sherbrooke [q. v.], who had succeeded Prevost, stated that Sewell's reinstatement added enormously to the difficulties of the government. Early in 1817 an effort was made to revive the impeachments, but Stuart suddenly seemed to lose his influence; the matter was dropped, and Sewell received compensation for ill-treatment. The rest of his career was uneventful. In 1839 he resigned his seat on the council, and in 1838 the post of chief justice. He died in Quebec on 12 Nov. 1839, and was buried amid general mourning. Sewell was married, and had three sons, who settled in Quebec.

Sewell was an excellent chief justice, stern, but with great command of temper. He was created an honorary LL.D. by Harvard University.

He published: 1. 'A Plan for the Federation of the British Provinces of North America,' 1814. 2. 'An Essay on the Judicial History of France,' 1824. 3. 'The Advantages of Opening the St. Lawrence,' 1824. 4. 'Dark Days of Canada,' 1831.

[Morgan's Sketches of Celebrated Canadians, and Bibliotheca Canadensis; Quebec Mercury, 12 Nov. 1839, and a letter in issue of 16 Nov. 1839; Roger's History of Canada, pp. 254-7, 321, 326.] C. A. H.

SEWELL, MARY (1797-1884), authoress, was born on 6 April 1797, at Sutton in Suffolk. She was daughter of John Wright, a gentleman-farmer, and his wife Ann, daughter of John Holmes of Tivetshall, Norfolk. Both parents were members of the Society of Friends. When Mary was twelve her father gave up farming, and joined business with a shipowner at Yarmouth. With the exception of a year spent at a school at Tottenham, Mary received her education at home. All regular study ended at the age of fifteen, when she commenced reading on her own account such authors as Moore, Byron, Southey, and Scott. Her father's affairs not prospering, she was for a time governess in a school in Essex. In 1819 she married Isaac Sewell, youngest son of William Sewell of Great Yarmouth, who had courted her for five years. They settled at Yarmouth, and there a daughter Anna was born on 30 March 1820. Soon afterwards they came to London, where a son Philip was born on 14 Jan. 1822. Isaac Sewell was not successful in business. At one time he kept a small shop near Bishopsgate Street, at another travelled for a large Nottingham lace factory. At length, in 1835, he was appointed manager of the London and County Joint-Stock Bank at Brighton. For the next ten years the family lived at Brighton, and subsequently at Lancing, Hayward's Heath, and Grayling Wells, until 1857 (when Sewell retired from the bank). Mrs. Sewell busied herself with the training of her children, writing for them her first book, 'Walks with Mamma,' in words of one syllable. In 1835 she left the Society of Friends for the church of England, into which she was eventually baptised. Her tone of mind was deeply religious, and she took great interest in philanthropic movements. She was a member of the Anti-Slavery Association.

In her sixtieth year Mrs. Sewell began seriously to write verses, with the object of inculcating moral virtues in all relations of life. 'Homely Ballads' was printed for private circulation in 1858 (it reached a fortieth thousand in 1889). Shortly afterwards Mrs. Sewell went to live at Blue Lodge, Wick, within a short distance of both Bath and Bristol, and there most of her works were written. In 1860 appeared her ballad, 'Mother's Last Words,' which had an unprecedented sale of 1,088,000 copies. It tells in simple language the story of two poor boys who were kept from evil courses by the memory of their mother's last words. Of another ballad, 'Our Father's Care,' 1861, no fewer than 776,000 copies were sold; 'Children of Summerbrook,' 1859, a tale in verse for little schoolgirls, and 'Patience Hart's Experiences in Service,' 1862, a prose tale, each had a sale of thirty-three thousand copies. Her stories were short, and published in pamphlet form.

In 1867 Mrs. Sewell returned to Norfolk, and spent the rest of her days at Old Catton, near Norwich. There her daughter died in April 1878, and her husband on 7 Nov. following. Mrs. Sewell's old age was remarkably vigorous. She died on 10 June 1884, and was buried beside her husband and daughter in the Friends' burying-ground at Lamas, Norfolk.

The popularity of her verses was due to the simplicity of language and form, to the simple faith they inculcated, and to the obviousness of the moral. Her poems were collected in 1861 under the title of 'Stories in Verse,' and again after her death in 1886, as 'Poems and Ballads,' in two volumes, with a memoir by Mrs. Bayly.

ANNA SEWELL (1820-1878), authoress, only daughter of the above, was born at Yarmouth on 30 March 1820. The severe spraining of both ankles in early childhood lamed her, and made her an invalid for life. In 1871 she began in the intervals of sickness to write her attractive 'autobiography' of a horse; it was published in 1877 under the title of 'Black Beauty,' and had a remarkable success (nearly a hundred thousand copies had been sold by 1894, when a new edition appeared). It was translated into French, Italian, and German. Its general aim was to induce kindness and sympathy towards horses, while it specially denounced the use of the bearing-rein; it was warmly recommended by the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Miss Sewell died in April 1878.

[Life and Letters of Mrs. Sewell by Mrs. Bayly, 1889, with portraits of Mrs. Sewell and her daughter; Devonshire House Portraits, pp. 600-2; Allibone's Dict. ii. 2001, and Supplement, ii. 1322; private information.] E. L.

SEWELL, RICHARD CLARKE (1803-1864), legal writer, eldest son of Thomas Sewell of Newport, Isle of Wight, brother of Henry Sewell [q. v.], premier of New Zealand, and of William Sewell [q. v.], was baptised at Newport on 6 Feb. 1803, and entered Winchester College in 1818. He matriculated from Magdalen College, Oxford, on 26 July 1821, was a demy of his college from 1821 until 1837, and a fellow from 1837 to 1866. He served as senior dean of arts in 1838, as bursar 1840, and was vice-president and prælector of natural philosophy in 1843. He graduated with a second-class in lit. hum., B.A. 1826, M.A. 1829, and D.C.L. 1840. He was awarded the Newdigate prize in 1825 for an English poem on 'The Temple of Vesta at Tivoli.' On 25 June 1830 he was called to the bar at the Middle Temple, became known as a special pleader, and took business on the western circuit and at the Hampshire sessions. Later in life he went to Australia, where he practised in the criminal law courts, and was in 1857 appointed reader in law to the university of Melbourne. He died at Melbourne on 9 Nov. 1864.

Sewell was a man of varied learning. He published: 1. 'Collectanea Parliamentaria,' 1831. 2. 'A Digest of the New Statutes and Rules, with the Cases decided at Banc and at Nisi Prius,' 1835. 3. 'The Municipal Corporation Act, 5 and 6 Will. IV, c. 76,' 1835. 4. 'Vindictis Ecclesiasticæ, or a Legal and Historical Argument against the Abolition of the Bishops' Courts in Cases of Correction, as proposed by the Church Discipline Act,' 1839. 5. 'A Manual of the Law and Practice of Registration of Voters in England and Wales,' 1836; 2nd ed. 1844. 6. 'A Treatise on the Law of Sheriffs with practical Forms and Precedents,' 1842. 7. 'A Treatise on the Law of Coroner, with Precedents and Forms,' 1843. 8. 'A Letter to the Members of the Venerable House of Convocation [on the subject of the Proceedings against W. G. Ward],' 1845. 9. 'Sacro-Politica: the Rights of the Anglican Church examined with, and tested by, the Laws of England and the Principles of the British Constitution,' 1848. 10. 'Legal Education: an Inaugural Lecture,' Melbourne, 1857. 11. 'The Speech of R. C. Sewell in defence of G. Chamberlain and W. Armstrong, charged with intent to murder W. Green,' Melbourne, 1859.

For the English Historical Society Sewell edited 'Gesta Stasphani,' 1846, and contributed to the 'Field,' 'The Papers of a Hampshire Fisherman.'

[Gent. Mag. March 1865, p. 386; Bloxam's Reg. of St. Mary Magdalen College, Oxford, 1881, vii. 284-7; M. C. Owen's The Sewells of the Isle of Wight.] G. C. B.

SEWELL, SIR THOMAS (d. 1784), master of the rolls, the son and heir of Thomas Sewell of West Ham, Essex, is said to have been 'bred up under an attorney' (Gent. Mag. 1784, ii. 555). He was admitted a member of the Middle Temple on 6 June 1729, was called to the bar on 24 May 1734, became a king's counsel in Hilary term 1754, and a bench of his inn in the following May. He practised with much success in the chancery courts, where, at the time of his appointment to the rolls, he was said to be making between three and four thousand pounds per annum (Chatham Correspondence, 1888-40, ii. 294-5 n.) After attempting to procure the Duke of Newcastle's interest at Seaford and Dover (Addit. MSS. Brit. Mus. 32856 f. 317, 32864 ff. 316, 336), he was returned to parliament in December 1763 for the borough of Harwich, which he continued to represent until the dissolution in March 1761. At the general election in this year he unsuccessfully contested Exeter. He was, however, elected for Winchelsea at a by-election in December 1761, and on 4 Dec. 1764 (London Gazette, 1764, No. 10475) he was appointed master of the rolls in the place of Sir Thomas Clarke [q. v.], with the annual salary of 2500*l.* W. Gerard Hamilton, in a letter to John Calcraft, says the appointment 'surprised every one exceedingly, and I am told no one more than Sewell himself, who had never applied for it, and who had no idea that he was in the contemplation of government till the acceptance of the office was proposed to him by the chancellor and Lord Mansfield jointly' (Chatham Correspondence, ii. 298 n.) Sir Fletcher Norton, the attorney-general, appears to have been named Clarke's successor at the rolls in the first instance (see WALPOLE, Memoirs of the Reign of King George III, 1894, ii. 26; WALPOLE, Letters, 1857-8, iv. 294, 297-8). Sir William de Grey, the solicitor-general, on hearing of Sewell's promotion, sent an indignant protest to George Grenville (Grenville Papers, 1862-8, ii. 471-2). Sewell was knighted on 30 Nov. 1764, and sworn a member of the privy council on 12 Dec. following (London Gazette, 1764, No. 10478). In January 1765 he was re-elected for Winchelsea. He, however, lost his seat at the general election in March 1768, and thereupon retired from parliamentary life. On the death of John Bowes, baron of Olonhyon, in July 1767, Sewell was mentioned for the Irish chancellorship (Grenville Papers, iv. 132), but the appointment was eventually given to James Hewitt (afterwards Viscount Lifford [q. v.]), then a puisne judge of the king's bench in England. Sewell, who made an able and efficient judge, presided at the rolls for over nineteen years. He died after a lingering illness on 6 March 1784, and was buried in the Rolls chapel.

He married, first, Catherine, elder daughter of Thomas Heath of Staunsted Montfichet in Essex, M.P. for Harwich, by whom he had four sons and four daughters. His first wife died on 17 Jan. 1769. He married, secondly, on 20 March 1773, Mary Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Dr. Humphrey Sibthorp of Canwick in Lincolnshire, professor of botany in the university of Oxford; by her he had an only daughter, who died an infant. His second wife died at Twyford Lodge, Maresfield, Sussex, on 16 Sept. 1820, aged 77.

Sewell died intestate, and was succeeded in the possession of Ottershaw Park and the manors of Aden, Stannards, and Fords, in Chobham, Surrey, by his eldest son, Thomas Bailey Heath Sewell, who died on 19 Oct. 1803, and was buried at Chobham. Sewell's third daughter, Frances Maria, was married to Matthew Lewis, deputy secretary at war, on 22 Feb. 1773, and became the mother of Matthew Gregory Lewis [q. v.], better known as Monk Lewis.

Sewell hardly seems to have shone in parliamentary life. Though no speech of his is to be found in the volumes of 'Parliamentary History,' a story is told that during one of the debates in the House of Commons in 1764 on Wilkes's arrest Sewell supported the adjournment of the question for three days because 'it would enable him to look into the authorities, and give a decided opinion on the subject, which he was, at present, unable to do.' When the debate was resumed, Sewell, who appeared according to his custom in his bag-wig, said that 'he had that morning turned the whole matter over in his mind as he lay upon his pillow, and, after ruminating and considering a great deal, he could not help declaring that he was of the same opinion that he was before.' Upon which Charles Townshend exclaimed that 'he was very sorry to observe that what the right honourable gentleman had found in his nightcap he had lost in his periwig' (Law and Lawyers, 1840, ii. 8).

[Foss's Judges of England, 1864, viii. 366-8; Lord Campbell's Lives of the Lord Chancellors, 1857, vii. 180, 132, 197-8, 201; Life of Lord Kenyon, 1873, pp. 102, 135; Life and Correspondence of M. G. Lewis, 1839, i. 8-7; Manning and Bray's Surrey, 1804-14, i. 408, iii. 196, 198, 201, 224; Brayley and Britton's Surrey, 1850, ii. 161-2, 225; Bloxam's Magdalen College Register, vi. 228; Townsend's Calendar of Knights, 1828, p. 53; Gent. Mag. 1764, p. 142, 1769 p. 55, 1773 pp. 103, 154, 1774 p. 390, 1784 i. 237-8, 1820, ii. 377; H. S. Smith's Parliaments of England, i. 69, 108, iii. 84; Official Return of Lists of Members of Parliament, ii. 112, 134; Haydn's Book of Dignities, 1890; Notes and Queries, 1st ser. viii. 388, 521, 521, ix. 86, 2nd ser. x. 396, 3rd ser. ii. 157, 177, 4th ser. vii. 306, 376, 7th ser. xii. 269, 8th ser. viii. 507, ix. 138, 178, 248.]

G. F. R. B.

SEWELL, WILLIAM (1804-1874), divine and author, born at Newport, Isle of Wight, on 23 Jan. 1804, and baptised on 13 Jan. 1807, was second son of Thomas Sewell of Newport, and brother of Henry Sewell [q. v.], premier of New Zealand, of Richard Clarke Sewell [q. v.], of Elizabeth Missing Sewell, a well-known novelist, and of the Rev. Dr. James Edwards Sewell, warden of New College, Oxford, since 1860. William was a commoner at Winchester, and, matriculating from Merton College, Oxford, on 4 Nov. 1822, was postmaster there from 1822 to 1827. He took first-class honours in classics, and graduated B.A. 1827, M.A. 1829, B.D. 1841, and D.D. 1857. The chancellor's prize for the English essay fell to him in 1828, and that for the Latin essay in 1829. The former prize essay, 'The Domestic Manners of the Greeks and Romans compared with those of the most refined States of Europe,' was printed in the 'Oxford English Prize Essays,' vol. iv. 1836. On 30 June 1827 he was elected a Petrean fellow of Exeter College, in 1830 he was ordained to the curacy of Whippingham in the Isle of Wight, and on 10 July 1831 was appointed to the perpetual curacy of St. Nicholas in Carisbrooke Castle, a small sinecure which he held till his death. He was tutor of his college from 1831 to 1853, and became librarian in 1833, sub-rector and divinity reader in 1835, and dean in 1839. In 1832 he was an examiner in the classical schools, and from 1836 to 1841 Whyte's professor of moral philosophy. The substance of his lectures he recast and published in two volumes, called 'Christian Morals and Christian Politics,' which formed part of the 'Englishman's Library' in 1840. He established a Moral Philosophy Club, to meet at the members' rooms in succession.

Sewell was an early friend of Pusey, Newman, and Keble, and in the earlier stages of the tractarian movement was one of the ablest men of the party. But the movement's romanising tendencies alienated him from it, and after the issue of 'Tract XO' he withdrew from all association with it. He explained his position in a published letter to Pusey (1841), and in March 1842 more clearly defined it in an article in the 'Quarterly Review' on 'The Divines of the Seventeenth Century,' which helped to stem the progress of the Tractarians in the direction of Rome.

Sewell was long one of the most prominent men in Oxford, writing and speaking on every public question. Newman declared that he had a word ready for everything; Hampden took the less flattering view that he was 'namby-pamby without solidity, consistency, and formation.' James Bowling Mozley says, under date of 15 March 1834: 'We had a splendid sermon from Sewell of Exeter College at the Assizes, on the origin of evil; not one person in the church understood one sentence of it.'

As a college tutor Sewell fully deserved his wide reputation. His lectures—chiefly on Plato and Bishop Butler—were discursive but always interesting (cf. SAMUEL CLARK, Memorials, 1878, pp. 135, 147-9). On the appearance of J. A. Froude's 'Nemesis of Faith' in 1849, Sewell, after reading it, declaimed to his class next morning (27 Feb.) on the wickedness of the book; and when one of the pupils, Arthur Blomfield (afterwards rector of Beverston, Gloucestershire), admitted, in reply to Sewell's inquiry, that he possessed a copy, Sewell seized it, tore it in pieces, and threw it on the hall fire (Daily News, 2 May 1892). This incident gave rise to a commonly received report that Froude's 'Nemesis of Faith' was publicly burnt by the authorities of the university. He had advanced views in regard to university reform, but in all his schemes of reform, which he defended in numerous pamphlets, he sought to perpetuate the predominance of the church of England. After a visit to Ireland in 1842, he, in conjunction with a small body of friends, founded St. Columba's College, Rathfarnham, near Dublin, which was opened on 26 March 1843, to furnish the gentry of Ireland with a school on the model of Eton. Sewell was one of the managers, but he had no capacity for business, and by 1847 had involved the college in a debt of 25,000*l*. This sum Lord J. G. Beresford, archbishop of Armagh, paid on the condition that Sewell relinquished his connection with St. Columba. In 1847 he issued 'Journal of a Residence at the College of St. Columba in Ireland.'

On his return to England Sewell helped to found St. Peter's College, Radley, near Oxford, a school for boys, which was opened on 6 March 1847, and was conducted on mediæval principles; the fasts of the church were strictly kept, and full services held in the chapel night and morning. He himself was warden from 1852 to 1862, by which time he had accumulated a debt of 28,000*l*. John Gellibrand Hubbard [q. v.] lent that sum to the college, and under improved management the loan was paid off. He published 'A Year's Sermons to Boys preached in the Chapel of St. Peter's College, Radley,' 2 vols. 1854-69.

Sewell thus involved himself irretrievably in debt. His fellowship at Exeter College was sequestered, and in 1862 he went abroad to avoid his creditors. He took up his residence at Deutz on the Rhine, opposite Cologne, and employed himself in examining critically the text of the New Testament. The result was a work published in 1878, after his death, entitled 'The Microscope of the New Testament.' In 1870, by the aid of friends, he was enabled to return to England. Until 1874 he resided chiefly in the Isle of Wight. He died at the residence of his nephew, the Rev. Arthur Sewell, at Litchford Hall, near Manchester, on 14 Nov. 1874, and was buried in St. Andrew's churchyard at Blackley. He was unmarried. A window inscribed to his memory is in Exeter College Chapel.

Apart from controversial pamphlets and many collected volumes of sermons (in 1831, 1832, 1835, and 1850), his chief published works were: 1. 'An Essay on the Cultivation of the Intellect by the Study of Dead Languages,' 1830. 2. 'Hora Philologica; or Conjectures on the Structure of the Greek Language,' 1830. 3. 'A Clergyman's Recreation; or Sacred Thoughts in Verse,' 1831; 2nd edit. 1835. 4. 'An Introduction to the Dialogues of Plato,' 1841. 5. 'Christian Politics,' 1844. 6. 'The Plea of Conscience for seceding from the Catholic Church to the Romish Schism in England,' 1845; 3rd ed. 1845. 7. 'The Nation, the Church, and the University of Oxford,' 1849. 8. 'Christian Veetiges of Creation,' 1861.

Sewell also wrote four novels: 'Uncle Peter's Fairy Tales,' 1844; 'Hawkestone, a Tale of and for England,' 1845; 'Uncle Peter's Tale for the Nineteenth Century,' 1868; and 'The Giant, a Fairy Tale,' 1870. He edited several of the novels written by his sister, Elizabeth Missions Sewell (1844-1850). To the 'Quarterly Review' he contributed fifteen articles, chiefly on theological subjects. He published translations of the 'Agamemnon,' 1843; the 'Georgics,' 1843, another edition, 1854; the 'Odes and Epodes of Horace,' 1850. He left in manuscript 'Lexilogus, a Collection of Greek Words,' 4 vols.; 'Lectures on Inspiration,' 'The Microscope of the Diatessaron,' 'The Diatessaron, arranged,' 2 vols.; 'The Psalms of David in Verse,' 'The Iliad of Homer translated,' 2 vols.; 'The Odyssey of Homer translated,' 2 vols.

[The Microscope of the New Testament, 1878, pref. pp. v-xii; Some Last Words of W. Sewell, with a prefatory notice by his sister, 1876; Liddon's Life of E. B. Pusey, 1893-4, i. 293, 305, ii. 204, 287, 289, iii. 137, 174, 248; Mozley's Reminiscences, ii. 23-8 (1892); Letters of J. B. Mozley, 1885, pp. 40, 71; Burgon's Twelve

Good Men, 1891, pp. 158, 187; G. D. Boyle's Recollections, 1895, pp. 105-8; Stokes's Life of George Potrie, 1868, pp. 358-60; Quarterly Review, April 1891, pp. 399, 403-4; Reminiscences of Oxford, ed. Conch (Oxford Hist. Soc.), 1892, p. 351; English Churchman, 19 Nov. 1874, p. 560, Guardian, 18 Nov. 1874, p. 1480; Times, 16 Nov. 1874 p. 7, 18 Nov. p. 11; Boase's Rectors and Fellows of Exeter College (Oxford Hist. Soc.), 1891, pp. cxliii-cl, 174; Notes and Queries, 8th ser. xii. 344; note from the Rev. II. Edmund Sharpe, vicar of Newport.] G. C. D.

SEXBURGA, SEAXBURG, or SEXBURH (d. 673), queen of the West-Saxons, the wife of King Cenwalh, Kenwealh, or Coin walch [q. v. for Sexburga's succession], succeeded to the throne after her husband's death, and reigned for one year. William of Malmesbury says that her husband appointed her to succeed him, that she ruled with masculine energy, collecting armies, keeping her troops under control, and defying her enemies, and that her one year's reign was ended by her death. The St. Albans writer, whose work was accepted by Wendover and Paris, relates that at the end of a year she was banished from the kingdom by the nobles, who would not fight under the leadership of a woman. Bishop Stubbs notes that in reading William of Malmesbury's account of her, it should be remembered that the historian had 'a special regard' for her husband Cenwalh, and observes that possibly both Malmesbury and the St. Albans writer represent the ideas of the age of the empress Matilda. There was no reason why in the seventh century it should be thought unseemly that a queen should reign.

[Bede's Hist. Eccl. iv. c. 12; A.-S. Chron. an. 672; Ethelwerd, c. 7, ap. Mon. Hist. Brit. p. 506; Henry of Huntingdon, p. 65 (Rolls Ser.); Will. of Malmesbury's Gesta Regum, i. sect. 32; Flor. Wig. i. 278, Rog. Wend. i. 162 (both in Engl. Hist. Soc.); Dict. Chr. Biogr. art. 'Sexburga' (1), by Bishop Stubbs.] W. H.

SEXBURGA, SAINT (d. 699?), queen of Kent and second abbess of Ely, was the eldest daughter of Anna (d. 654), king of the East-Angles. Her sisters were St. Etheldreda [q. v.], first abbess of Ely; Ethelburga, abbess of Faremontier in Brie; and St. Witburga, a nun of Ely. Sæthryd, abbess of Faremontier, was her half-sister. She married Earconbert, king of Kent, about 640, the year of his succession to his father Eadbald [q. v.], and lived with him twenty-four years until his death in 664, having by him two sons, Egbert (d. 673?) and Ellotheri or Lothar (d. 685?), both successively kings of Kent, and two daughters, St. Earcongota, a nun of Fare-montier, and St. Ermenhilda or Eormenhild, queen of Wulfhere, king of Mercia, and abbess of Ely. After her husband's death she is said to have ruled for a time for her son Egbert. She founded a monastery for nuns in the isle of Sheppey, it is said for, or in memory of, her husband, which came to be called Minster, and, having received the veil from Archbishop Theodoric, ruled it as abbess. After a while—about 675—she entered the monastery of Ely, desiring to be instructed by her sister Etheldreda, then abbess there. The Ely historian records a speech that she is supposed to have made to her nuns in Sheppey, bidding them farewell, and appointing her daughter Ermenhilda to succeed her as abbess. On the death of Etheldreda, probably in 679, Sexburga was chosen to succeed her. Sixteen years later, in 695, she built a shrine for Etheldreda's body, which she laid in a white marble coffin, procured from the ruined city of Grantchester. After a long life she died, and was buried near her sister, the supposed year of her death being 699, and her day in the calendar 6 July. Her daughter Ermenhilda succeeded her as abbess, being herself succeeded at Sheppey by her own daughter, St. Werburga or Werburgh [q. v.] The life of Sexburga, printed in Capgrave's 'Nova Legenda' and the 'Acta Sanctorum', is taken from Cotton. MS. Tib. E. 1. There is another Latin life in a twelfth-century manuscript, Cotton MS. Calig. A. viii., and a fragment of an English life of two folios in Lambeth MS. 427.

[Bede's Hist. Eccl. iii. c. 8, iv. c. 19, 22, Flor. Wig. i. 261 (both in Engl. Hist. Soc.); Liber Elien i. cc. 18, 25-6, 28, 36 (Angl. Chr. Soc.), A. SS. Bolland. Jul. ii. 346-9; Hardy's Cat. of Mat. i. 360-2 (Rolls Ser.); Montalembert's Monks of the West, iv. 401-4, ed. Gaequet; Dict. Chr. Biogr. art. 'Sexburga' (2), by Bishop Stubbs.] W. H.

SEXBY, EDWARD (d. 1658), conspirator, was a native of Suffolk, and entered Cromwell's regiment of horse about 1643. In 1647, being still a private in the same regiment, now commanded by Fairfax, he took a leading part in the movement against disbanding the army, and was one of the three soldiers charged with the letter from the army to their generals which Skippon brought before the House of Commons on 30 April 1647 (RUSHWORTH, vi. 474; Clarke Papers, i. 430). He became one of the leaders of the 'agitators,' and acted as their chief spokesman in the debates of the army council in October 1647 (ib. i. 83). His speeches were very vigorous and effective, opposing all compromise with the king and demanding the immediate establishment of manhood suffrage (ib. i. 227, 322, 329, 377).

Sexby appears to have left the army about the close of 1647, but happening to be present at the battle of Preston, with a letter from John Lilburne to Cromwell, he was entrusted with a despatch from Cromwell to the speaker announcing his victory. The House of Commons voted him 100*l.* as a reward (ib. ii. 251; Commons' Journals, v. 680). In February 1649 parliament entrusted him with the duty of arresting the Scottish commissioners, for which he was ordered 20*l.* (ib. vi. 152). He was also appointed governor of Portland, and henceforth described as Captain Sexby, and was more than once charged with commissions requiring courage and dexterity (Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1649-50, pp. 135, 155, 531). In June 1650, at Cromwell's suggestion, he was charged to raise a foot regiment for service in Ireland, but when completed it was ordered to Scotland. Sexby, who held the rank first of lieutenant-colonel and then of colonel, took part with his regiment in the siege of Tallow Castle in February 1651 (ib. 1650, pp. 206, 332, 352; Meourius Politicus, p. 621). In June 1651 he was tried by court-martial for detaining the pay of his soldiers, and lost his commission (Clarke MSS.)

A few months later Cromwell and the intelligence committee of the council of state sent Sexby on a mission to France. He was charged to give an account of the political condition and the temper of the people. He negotiated with the Prince de Conti and the Frondeurs of Guienne, to whom he proposed an adaptation of the 'Agreement of the People' as the basis of a republican constitution for France, and with the Huguenots of Languedoc. One of his emissaries was captured, and Sexby had a narrow escape himself, if Ludlow is to be trusted (LUDLOW, Memoirs, i. 415; Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1654, p. 160; Journal of Joachim Hane, 1896, pp. xiv-xvii). He returned to England about August 1653, and on 23 Aug. 1654 was ordered 1,000*l.* for his expenses during his mission.

Sexby was eager for an Anglo-Spanish league against France, and hoped to obtain the command of the levies which it was proposed to send to the support of the Frondeurs. Cromwell's abandonment of the projects against France, and still more his assumption of the protectorate, caused a breach between Sexby and the Protector. The former allied himself with the disaffected republicans, disseminated pamphlets against the Protector, and took a leading part in the schemes for a joint rising of royalists and levellers in the spring of 1655 (THURLOE, vi. 691, 829). In February 1655 Cromwell's officers in the west of England were in hot pursuit of Sexby, but he succeeded in escaping to Flanders (ib. iii. 162, 165, 195). At Antwerp he made the acquaintance of Colonel Robert Phelps (son of Sir Robert Phelps [q. v.]) and other royalists, to whom he described Cromwell as a false, perjured rogue, and affirmed that, if proper security for popular liberties were given, he would be content to see Charles II restored (Nicholas Papers, i. 299, 340, 347).

Sexby also sought an interview with Count Fuensaldanha, the governor of the Spanish Netherlands, to whom he revealed all he knew of Cromwell's foreign plans and of the expedition to the West Indies, and from whom he asked a supply of money and the assistance of some of the Irish troops in the Spanish service in order to raise an insurrection in England. Fuensaldanha sent Sexby to Spain that his proposals might be considered by the Spanish council (June 1655), and he returned again about December with supplies of money and conditional promises of support (Clarendon State Papers, iii. 271). Father Peter Talbot [q. v.], who acted as interpreter in Sexby's dealings with Fuensaldanha, communicated his proposals to Charles II, urging the king to come to an agreement with Spain, and to utilise Sexby and his party (ib. iii. 281). In December 1656 Sexby presented a paper of proposals to Don John of Austria, offering to raise a civil war in England, and requesting a thousand Irish foot and four hundred horses (for which he undertook to provide troopers). The royalists were to assist, but he stipulated 'that no mention be made of the king before such time Cromwell be destroyed, and till then the royalists that shall take arms shall speak of nothing but the liberty of the country, according to the declaration whereof I have spoken with the King of England's ministers' (ib. iii. 315).

The Protector's government through its agents abroad was kept well informed of Sexby's negotiations with Spain, and a number of his intercepted letters, written under the assumed names of 'Brookes' and 'Hungerford,' were in its hands (THURLOE, State Papers, v. 37, 349, vi. 1, 33, 182). In Cromwell's speech at the opening of his second parliament (17 Sept. 1656), he informed them of Sexby's plot, terming him 'a wretched creature, an apostate from religion and all honesty' (CARLILE, Cromwell's Speech, p. 5). The assassination of Cromwell was an essential preliminary to the success of the rising. Sexby sent over 'strange engines' for the purpose, but his agents missed their opportunities, and in January 1657 an attempt to fire Whitehall led to the arrest of their leader, Miles Sindercombe [q. v.] (Cromwelliana, p. 160; Clarendon State Papers, iii. 325, 327). Still confident, Sexby devised new plots. 'As not discouraged, he wrote to Father Talbot, 'for so long as Sexby lives there is no danger but Cromwell shall have his hands full, and I hope his heart are long, for I have more irons in the fire for Cromwell than one. . . . Either I or Cromwell must perish' (ib. iii. 331, 335, 339). Under the name of William Allen he drew up an apology for tyrannicide, entitled 'Killing no Murder,' which he ironically dedicated to Cromwell himself, printed in Holland, and sent over to England about May 1657 (ib. iii. 343; THURLOE, vi. 311). In June he followed his pamphlet to England, to concert measures for carrying out its principles, and on 24 July, just as he was embarking for Flanders again, he was arrested 'in a mean habit disguised as a countryman' (Cromwelliana, p. 168; Clarendon State Papers, iii. 357, 362). He died in the Tower on 13 Jan. 1658, 'having been awhile distracted in his mind and long sick' (Cromwelliana, p. 169).

'Killing no Murder' was answered by Michael Hawke of the Inner Temple in 'Killing is Murder and no Murder,' 1657, 4to. Sexby's authorship of the former is proved by internal evidence, and by his own confession made in the Tower (THURLOE, vi. 560). Captain Silas Titus [q. v.], who was intimate with Sexby, and may perhaps have given him some assistance in writing it, was, after the Restoration, reputed its author (WOOD, Athena, iv. 624). It is reprinted in the 'Harleian Miscellany,' ed. Park, iv. 289, and by Professor Henry Morley in his 'Famous Pamphlets.'

[Authorities given in the article.] C. H. F.

SEXRED or SEXRÆD (d. 626), king of the East-Saxons, was the son of Sebert (d. 616?) [q. v.] the first Christian king of the East-Saxons. He refused to accept Christianity, and when he succeeded his father in 616, reigning conjointly with his two brothers, Sæward and another, said on no good authority to have been named Sigebert (BROMTON, ap. Decem SS. col. 743), openly practised paganism and gave permission to his subjects to worship their idols. When he and his brothers saw Mellitus (d. 624) [q. v.], bishop of London, giving the eucharist to the people in church, they said to him, so it was commonly believed in Bede's time, 'Why do you not offer us the white bread that you used to give to our father Saba, for so they called him, and which you still give to the people?' Mellitus answered that if they would be washed in the font they should have it, but that otherwise it would do them no good. But they said that they would not enter the font, for they did not need washing but refreshment. The matter was often explained to them by the bishop, who persisted in refusing their request. At last they grew angry and banished him from their kingdom. Not long afterwards they went out to fight with the West-Saxons, and were slain, their army being almost wholly destroyed (Binn. Hist. Eccl. ii. c. 6). This battle was fought against Ceawlin [q. v.] and Owichelm, the West-Saxon kings who invaded their territory with a larger force than the East-Saxons could muster in or about 626. They were succeeded by Sæward's son Sigebert the Little.

[Mon. Hist. Brit. pp. 629, 637; Henry of Huntingdon, sect. 31, p. 67 (Rolls Ser.); Dict. Chr. Biogr. art. 'Sæxred,' by Bishop Stubbs.]
W. H.

SEXTEN, RICHARD (d. 1568), physician and divine. [See ARGENTINE, RICHARD.]

SEYER, SAMUEL (1757-1891), historian of Bristol, born in 1757, was the son of Samuel Seyer (1719?-1776), then master of Bristol grammar school. The elder Seyer, son of a gentleman of Bristol of the same names, was educated at Pembroke College, Oxford, whence he graduated B.A. in 1739 and M.A. in 1742. In 1764 he became rector of St. Michael's, Bristol. He published 'Essays in Scripture Truths' (1771) and other works.

The younger Seyer matriculated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, on 25 Nov. 1772, and graduated B.A. in 1776 and M.A. in 1780. About 1790 he succeeded John Jones at the Royal Fort school, where for ten years Andrew Crosse [q. v.], the electrician, was among his scholars; Crosse deemed his master narrow-minded and unjust. Other pupils were John Kenyon [q. v.] and William John Broderip [q. v.]. In 1818 he became perpetual curate of Ilorfield, and in 1824 rector of Filton, Gloucestershire.

Following in the footsteps of William Barrett (d. 1789) [q. v.], author of the 'History and Antiquities of Bristol,' with whom he was well acquainted, Seyer published in 1812 'Charters and Letters Patent granted to the Town and Oity of Bristol' (4to). The Latin is printed under an English translation. Seyer was refused access to the originals in the Bristol council-house, and founded his text on a late manuscript in the Bodleian (Rawlinson 247). He used a translation published in 1786 which was not of much value. In 1821-3 appeared Seyer's 'Memoirs, Historical and Topographical, of Bristol and its Neighbourhood,' with plates, by Edward Blore [q. v.] and others (2 vols. 4to). The work, which brings the narrative down to 1760, incorporated the archives of the Berkeley family and the Bristol calendars. Painstaking and learned, it remains a valuable specimen of local history. Seyer's collections for a second part, on the topography of Bristol, are preserved in manuscript in the Museum Library, Bristol (cf. HUNT, Bristol, 1887, p. 189; RICART, Kalender, Camden Soc., vol. ii.)

Seyer died at Bristol on 25 Aug. 1831. A portrait was engraved by Walker from a painting by Branwhite. Another was painted and engraved by Pethar.

Besides his archaeological works, Seyer published: 1. 'The Principles of Christianity,' 1796; 1806, 12mo. 2. 'The Syntax of Latin Verbs,' 1798, 8vo. 3. 'Observations on the Causes of Clerical Non-residence, and on the Act of Parliament lately passed for its Prevention,' 1808, 8vo. 4. 'Latium Redivivum: a Treatise on the Modern Use of the Latin Language and the Prevalence of the French; to which is added a Specimen, accommodated to Modern Use,' 1808, 8vo. He also translated into English verse the Latin poem of Vida on Chess.

[Annual Register, 1831 (App. to Chron. p. 254); Memorials of Andrew Crosse, ch. i.; Foster's Alumni Oxon.; Prefaces to Seyer's Charters and Memorials; Taylor's Book about Bristol, p. 371; Evans's Cat. Engr. Portraits, Nos 21, 160, and 9404; notes kindly supplied by William George, esq., of Bristol.] G. LE G. N.

SEYFFARTH, MRS. LOUISA (1798-1843), watercolour-painter. [See SHARPE.]

SEYMOUR, MRS. (A. 1717-1723), actress, is first heard of on 22 Aug. 1717, when, with the summer company at Drury Lane, she played Eugenia in Shadwell's 'Scowlers.' On 17 June 1718, still with the summer company, she was the original Leonora in Savage's 'Love in a Veil.' On 11 July she was Mirtilla in 'Love for Money,' and on 15 Aug. Christiana in 'Love in a Wood.' On 16 Oct. she made, as Lucia in 'Cato,' her first recorded appearance at Lincoln's Inn Fields, Decius being played by Bohemia, better known as Boheme, an actor originally from Southwark Fair, whom subsequently she married. She was also Cynthia in the 'Double Dealer,' Rutland in the 'Unhappy Favourite,' Lady Brute in the 'Provoked Wife,' had a part in 'Platonick Love, or the Innocent Mistress, by Mrs. Pix, and was on 16 Jan. 1719 the original Lady Raleigh in Sewell's 'Sir Walter Raleigh', and on 7 Feb. Violetta in the 'Younger Brother, or the Sham Marquis.' On 29 Feb. 1720 she was the first Eudisia in 'Imperial Captives,' an adaptation by Motley apparently of the 'Genséric, Roi des Vandales,' of Madame Deshoulières. She was also seen as Desdemona to Quin's Othello, and Marcella in 'Don Quixote.' In 1720-1 she was Queen in Dryden's 'Spanish Friar,' Cordelia, Mrs. Page, Lady Touchwood in the 'Double Dealer,' Cressida, Lady Macduff, Elvira in 'Love makes a Man,' Isabella in 'Measure for Measure,' Queen in 'Richard II,' Hero (presumably) in 'Much Ado about Nothing,' Quisara in the 'Island Princess,' Queen in 'Richard III,' Abra-mulé, Arpasia in 'Tamerlane,' Mrs. Winwife in the 'Artful Husband,' Portia in 'Julius Cæsar,' Lady Outside in 'Woman's a Riddle,' and Annabella in the 'Quaker's Wedding.' Her original parts during this season were a character, presumably Mariana, in 'No Fools like Wits' (the 'Female Virtues' with a new title), 10 Jan. 1721; Lady Meanwell in Odell's 'Chimera,' 19 Jan.; Isabella in the 'Fair Captive,' altered by Mrs. Haywood from Captain Hurst, 4 March; Stratonice in Motley's 'Antiochus,' 13 April; and Louisa in 'Fatal Extravagance,' by Mitchell or Aaron Hill, 21 April. In 1721-2 she was Amanda in 'Love's Last Shift,' Louisa in 'Love makes a Man,' Monimia in the 'Orphan,' Sylvia in the 'Recruiting Officer,' Almeyda in 'Don Sebastian,' Charlot Well-don in 'Oroonoko,' Mrs. Sullen in the 'Beaux' Stratagem,' Belvidera in 'Venice Preserved,' Portia in the 'Jew of Venice,' Widow Richlove in 'Injured Love,' Lady Duncie in the 'Soldier's Fortune,' Lætitia in the 'Old Bachelor,' Arbella in the 'Committee,' Augusta in the 'History and Fall of Domitian'—a version of the 'Roman Actor' of Massinger—and Tamora in 'Titus Andronicus,' and was the first Hypermnestra in Sturmy's 'Love and Duty' on 22 Jan. 1722, in which character she spoke an indecent epilogue; and Sabrina in 'Hibernia Freed,' by William Phillips, on 13 Feb. In her last season, 1722-3, she was Corinna in 'Woman's Revenge,' Queen in 'Hamlet,' Oal-phurnia in 'Julius Cæsar,' Jocasta in 'Edipus,' Amaranta in the 'Spanish Curate,' Roxana in the 'Rival Queens,' Teresa in the 'Squire of Alsatia,' and Phædra in 'Phædra and Hippolitus.' On 15 Dec. she was the original Isabella in Sturmy's 'Compromise,' and on 22 Feb. 1723 the original Mariamne in Fenton's play so named.

For her benefit she played, on 2 April 1723, some character, probably Mrs. Brittle, in the 'Amorous Wife.' Shortly afterwards, Genest thinks in Passion week, she married Anthony Boheme. Boheme, who had been a sailor, was, in spite of his straddling gait, reputed a good actor in the second rank. He was highly esteemed in Lear, and played parts so widely different as Mahomet, Julius Cæsar, Shylock, Edipus, Alexander, Wolsey, Cato, Shallow, Don Quixote, Voltorein 'Volpone,' and Mopus in the 'Cheats.' He appears to have been cut off by a fever about 1730.

Mrs. Boheme's name appears—probably in mistake—as Mrs. Seymour to Mariamne on 15 April. On the 16th, as Mrs. Boheme, late Mrs. Seymour, she played Arbella in the 'Committee.' Under her new name she was, on 23 April, the original Jocasta in the 'Fatal Legacy,' adapted from Racine by a young lady. On 7 June 1723, as Mariamne, was made what is said to have been her last appearance on the stage, from which at the close of the season she retired. Her further career is not to be traced.

Mrs. Seymour was tall and well made, with a pleasing and flexible voice, and an expressive face, which she charged with much passion. Davies says that in a revival of 'Don Carlos' at Lincoln's Inn Fields, 'Boheme's action in Philip (Betterton's part), and Mrs. Seymour by her excellence in the Queen, rendered their names celebrated, and contributed to establish a company struggling with difficulties' (Dramatic Miscellanies, iii. 179-80). Her reputation was also established as Belvidera. Ryan, says Davies, 'was so strongly prejudiced in the opinion of Mrs. Seymour's merit, that . . . he assured me he thought her superior to all the actresses he had ever seen' (ib. iii. 247-8). Davies judges 'too partial' the superiority awarded her over Mrs. Oldfield and Mrs. Porter, but holds that she must have had a large amount of merit to engage so strongly Ryan's judgment. Short as was her career, it was fully occupied, proving that she must have had great variety and range. In her later years she grew bulky in person. Her portrait as Mariamne, by Vertue, with Boheme as Herod, accompanies the second edition of Fenton's tragedy.

[Genest's Account of the English Stage; Davies's Dramatic Miscellanies; Victor's Hist. of the Theatres of London and Dublin; Doran's Annals of the Stage, ed. Lowe.] J. K.

SEYMOUR, AARON CROSSLEY HOBART (1789-1870), hymn-writer, elder brother of Michael Hobart Seymour [q.v.], was the son of John Crossley Seymour, vicar of Caherelly, diocese of Cashel, who married the eldest daughter of Edward Wight, rector of Meelick, co. Limerick, a member of an old Surrey family. He was born in co. Limerick on 19 Dec. 1789, and received most of his education at home. He was drawn in early life into the religious group formed by Selina Hastings, countess of Huntingdon [q. v.], whose biography he afterwards wrote. His first work was 'Vital Christianity,' exhibited in a series of letters on the most important subjects of religion, addressed to young persons; it appeared in 1810; a second edition was published in 1819. This work contains all his hymns, some of which are highly popular. In 1816 Seymour published a memoir of Charlotte Brooke [q. v.], prefixed to an edition of her 'Reliques of Irish Poetry.' His 'Life and Times of Selina, Countess of Huntingdon,' appeared in 1839. About 1850 he went to reside in Italy, and spent many years in Naples. In 1869 he retired to Bristol, and died there in October 1870. He took a deep interest in hymnology, and assisted Joseph Miller in preparing his 'Singers and Songs of the Church.'

[Miller's Singers and Songs of the Church, 2nd edit.; Julian's Dict. of Hymnology; Allibone's Dict. of Engl. Lit.; Brit. Mus. Cat.] D. J. O'D.

SEYMOUR, LADY CATHERINE, Countess of Hertford (1538 ?-1568), probably born in 1538, was second of three daughters of Henry Grey, duke of Suffolk [q. v.], and his wife, Frances Brandon, her elder sister being Lady Jane Grey [see DUDLEY, LADY JANE], and her younger Lady Mary Keys [q. v.] She was thus great-granddaughter of Henry VII, and after the execution of her sister Jane stood, according to Henry VIII's will, next in succession to the crown after Queen Mary and Queen Elizabeth. Catherine received the same elaborate education as her sister Jane, and shared in her graces and accomplishments. On Whit Sunday, 21 May 1558, she was married to Henry Herbert, afterwards second earl of Pembroke [q. v.], whose father was one of the Duke of Northumberland's chief supporters. The marriage does not seem to have been consummated, and, after the execution of Catherine's sister, Lady Jane Grey, and of her father the Duke of Suffolk, Pembroke found it convenient to dissolve the compromising alliance, and Catherine was divorced. On the accession of Elizabeth she was given a place at court, but her misfortunes were soon renewed by her marriage with Edward Seymour, earl of Hertford [q. v.]

The attachment between her and Seymour had begun during Mary's reign, while Catherine was living under the care of the Duchess of Somerset, and both Catherine and her mother, the Duchess of Suffolk, regarded Seymour with favour (Harl. MS. 6286). At first they hoped to obtain Elizabeth's assent to their marriage through the intervention of the Duchess of Suffolk, but the latter died in December 1559, and, despairing probably of the queen's consent, they were secretly married at the bridegroom's house in Cannon Row, Westminster, in November or December 1560. By an act of 1566, it was treason for a person of royal blood to marry without the sovereign's consent. The arrangements for Lady Catherine's marriage were made with the help of the bridegroom's sister, Lady Jane Seymour, and the ceremony was performed by a priest whose identity was never revealed or discovered. During the following summer the countess's condition laid her open to suspicion, and by August the Duchess of Somerset had heard of her marriage with Hertford. In the same month she was sent to the Tower and questioned on the subject, but refused to confess (Parker Corresp. p. 149). Hertford was summoned from Paris, and joined his wife in the Tower on 5 Sept. On the 24th she gave birth to her eldest son, Edward, lord Beauchamp [see under SEYMOUR, EDWARD, EARL OF HERTFORD]. The news roused Elizabeth to fury, and henceforth she pursued the unhappy countess with vindictive hostility. A commission was appointed, with Parker at its head, to 'judge' of her 'infamous conversation' and 'pretended marriage.' The earl and the countess were examined separately in the Tower; their evidence agreed on all essential points, but they were unable to produce the priest who performed the ceremony, or any documentary evidence to support their statements, and on 12 May 1562 the commission declared that there had been no marriage (see a minute account of its proceedings in Harl. MS. 6286). According to Dugdale, 'the validity of this marriage being afterwards tried at common law, the minister who married them being present, and other circumstances agreeing, the jury found it a good marriage;' but this statement lacks corroboration, though Catherine was generally styled Countess of Hertford (see BROMFORD, Hereditary Right, p. 187; LUDERS, Right of Succession to the Crown in the Reign of Elizabeth; BAILEY, Succession to the English Crown, 1879, pp. 179-82; HALLAM, Const. Hist. i. 127-9, 289-92). Meanwhile the orders to keep the pair separate in the Tower were not strictly carried out, and the birth of a second son, Thomas, on 11 Feb. 1562-3, was followed by further measures of severity against Hertford. In August, however, the countess was removed from the Tower to the custody of her uncle, Lord John Grey, at Pirgo, Essex, in consequence of the plague; but all hopes of her complete restoration to liberty were dispelled by a revival of the discussion of her claims to the succession.

Her importance in this regard had been already illustrated in 1560 by a scheme formed by Philip of Spain for carrying off and marrying her, with the object of asserting her claim in preference to Elizabeth's, on the ground that the latter was a bastard (Cal. Hatfield MSS. i. 279; WRIGHT, Elizabeth, i. 7, 8). In 1568 John Hales (d. 1571) [q. v.] wrote a pamphlet (extant in Harl. MS. 537) maintaining the validity of the countess's marriage against the decision of the commission; he also procured 'sentences and counsils of lawyers from beyond seas' in support of the same opinion. These proceedings came to the knowledge of the government in April 1564, which believed that Hales had been instigated by Francis Newdigate, second husband to the Duchess of Somerset, in whose keeping Hertford then was. The discovery caused some commotion, which became known as the tempestas Halesiana (ELLIS, Original Letters, 2nd ser. ii. 285; Hatfield MSS. i. 291-6). On Grey's death, 21 Nov. 1564, the countess was transferred to the custody of Sir William Petre [q. v.] at Ingatestone, Essex. Afterwards she was handed over to the charge of Sir John Wentworth, and on his death to that of Sir Owen Hopton at Cockfield Hall. The fact that Hopton was afterwards lieutenant of the Tower has led to the assumption that the countess was confined there a second time. Her repeated and pathetic appeals to be allowed to join her husband met with no response, and she died at Cockfield on 27 Jan. 1567-8 (see an account of her death in Harl. MS. xxxix. f. 380, printed in ELLIS, Original Letters, 2nd ser. vol. ii.) She was buried in Salisbury Cathedral, where there is an inscription to her memory (with a wrong date of death, Epitaphs in Salisbury Cathedral, 1825, p. 86; cf. Wilt. Archaeological Mag. xv. 153).

[Besides authorities quoted in the text, and under art. SEYMOUR, EDWARD, EARL OF HERTFORD, see Craik's Romance of the Peerage, ii. 280-300; Ellis's Original Letters, 2nd ser. vol. ii. passim; Notes and Queries, 8th ser. vii. 121, 161, 283, 342, 422.] A. F. P.

SEYMOUR, CHARLES, sixth DUKE OF SOMERSET (1662-1748), born on 12 Aug. 1662, was youngest son of Charles, second baron Seymour of Trowbridge (d. 1665), and fourth son by his father's second wife, Elizabeth, daughter of William Alington, first baron Alington. The father was eldest son and heir of Francis, first baron Seymour of Trowbridge [q. v.], younger brother of William, second duke of Somerset [q. v.] Charles's elder brother Francis, who was born on 17 Jan. 1657, not only succeeded his father as third Baron Seymour of Trowbridge, but became fifth Duke of Somerset on the death, in 1675, of his cousin John, fourth duke; he was murdered at Lerici, near Genoa, on 20 April 1678. He was said to have offered an affront in the church of the Augustinians at Lerici to a lady of rank, whereupon the latter's husband, Horatio Botti, shot the duke at the door of his inn. The murdered man's uncle, Lord Alington, demanded satisfaction of the republic, but Botti escaped, and his effigy only was hung by the Genoese.

Charles, who had recently entered at Trinity College, Cambridge, thus succeeded to the dukedom; but it was to his marriage he owed all his wealth and at least half of his importance. His wife, Elizabeth Percy, born on 26 Jan. 1667, was the only surviving daughter and sole heiress of Josceline, eleventh and last earl of Northumberland. At the age of four she succeeded to the honours and estates of the house of Percy, holding in her own right six of the oldest baronies in the kingdom, namely Percy, Lucy, Poynings, Fitz-Payne, Bryan, and Latimer. She was brought up by her grandmother, the dowager countess (see under PERCY, ALGERNON, tenth EARL), who in February 1679 refused her ward's hand to Charles II for his son, the Duke of Richmond [see LENNOX, CHARLES, first DUKE], and a few weeks later bestowed the heiress upon Henry Cavendish, earl of Ogle, a sickly boy of fifteen, heir of Henry, second duke of Newcastle. The victim's great-aunt, 'Sacharissa,' found the bridegroom the ugliest and 'saddest creature.' However, he took the name of Percy, and it was arranged that he should travel for two years. Before a year had elapsed he died, and the old countess lost no time in arranging a fresh match between her ward and (by way of contrast) a well-battered rake, Thomas Thynne [q. v.] of Longleat in Wiltshire, familiarly known as 'Tom of Ten Thousand.' Thynne was formally married to Lady Ogle in the summer of 1681, but immediately after the wedding the bride of fourteen fled for protection to Lady Temple at The Hague, and Thynne was murdered in Pall Mall by hired assassins on 12 Feb. 1681-2, at the instigation of Count Charles Königsmark, who had been a rival suitor for the Countess of Ogle. Some three months after Thynne's death the countess, who was now fifteen, consented to regard the Duke of Somerset in the light of a suitor, and on 30 May 1682 they were married, the duke having previously agreed to assume the names and arms of Percy; but from this agreement he was released when his wife came of age. Besides the estates and the territorial influence of the Percys, Somerset thus became master of Alnwick Castle, Petworth, Syon House, and Northampton, better known by its later title of Northumberland House in the Strand.

Somerset was appointed a gentleman of the bedchamber in 1683, was installed K.G. on 8 April 1684, and was second mourner at Charles II's funeral. His handsome figure appeared to advantage in pageants of this character, for which he showed an extraordinary predilection, taking a chief part at the funerals of Mary, William III, Anne, and George I, and bearing the orb at four coronations. His wife was chief mourner at the funeral of Mary. On 2 Aug. 1685 he was appointed colonel of the queen's dragoons (now 3rd hussars), a regiment formed out of some troops specially raised to cope with Monmouth's rebellion. In July 1687 James assigned to Somerset as first lord of the bedchamber the duty of introducing at St. James's the papal nuncio d'Adda, whom James was determined to receive publicly in his official character. Somerset objected to the task on the ground that its performance would subject him to a heavy penalty under the law of the land. 'I would have you fear me as well as the law,' said James. 'I cannot fear you,' was the answer; 'as long as I commit no offence I am secure in your majesty's justice.' He lost his place and his regiment, but his spirited conduct raised him high in the estimation of the people.

Somerset was 'one of those in arms' with the Prince of Orange in 1688, but he took a much less conspicuous part than his kinsman, Sir Edward Seymour [q. v.]. In 1689 he was elected chancellor of Cambridge University (he was incorporated D.C.L. at Oxford in August 1702). He succeeded Halifax as speaker of the lords in 1690, and was one of the regents in July to November 1701. William looked coldly upon him, but with Anne he was a prime favourite. When, as princess, she had been summarily ejected from the cockpit in April 1692, and the courtiers were forbidden to countenance her, Somerset had caused her to be warmly welcomed at Syon House (cf. London Gazette, No. 2758). By her influence he was made in 1702 master of the horse, and in 1706 one of the commissioners for the union with Scotland. In December 1708 he was sent to Portsmouth to welcome the Archduke Charles as king of Spain, and figured prominently in the magnificent ceremonial devised for the occasion. He supported Marlborough in this ministerial crisis of February 1708; but Marlborough thought that the mastership of the horse was fully commensurate with Somerset's abilities, and ignored his claims to further advancement, being at some pains to explain to his wife that he never dreamed of employing so witless a person 'in anything that is of any consequence' (Works, x. 300). Somerset was consequently driven into the arms of Harley, and, though he was dismayed by the extent of the Tory reaction in 1710, he retained his place in the council until August 1711. St. John was at last successful in his ruses to get rid of him, but he still had a large share in the confidence of Anne. His wife, too, despite her extreme coolness towards Harley and Mrs. Masham, remained mistress of the robes and groom of the stole, in which she had succeeded the Duchess of Marlborough in January 1711, and the queen was proof against all the efforts made to remove her. No one worked harder for this object than Swift, who, in December 1711, circulated a cruel lampoon upon the duchess, 'The Windsor Prophecy' (which he afterwards tried to recall). In it she was reproached with red hair ('Beware of carrots from Northumberland') and the murder of Thynne. But the confidante continued, in Swift's words, to 'instil venom into the royal ear.' She certainly aided the Hanoverian interests and influenced her husband in the same direction.

When the queen lay dying, Somerset repaired to the council board, where he had been a stranger for three years, and supported Shrewsbury, Somers, and Argyle in the steps taken to ensure the succession of George I. The new king reinstated him as master of the horse. Two years later, however, upon being refused permission to bail his son-in-law, Sir William Wyndham [q. v.], who was suspected of corresponding with the Pretender, Somerset expressed his indignation in terms which procured his dismissal. Henceforth he devoted himself to ruling his family and estates, and Horace Walpole often cites him as the type of aristocratic arrogance and parental despotism. He became known as 'the proud duke,' and the anecdote that his pride is kept alive by the anecdote that, when his second duchess once tapped him with her fan, he remarked, 'Madam, my first duchess was a Percy, and she never took such a liberty.' He mulcted his daughter Charlotte of 20,000*l.* of her inheritance for having sat down in his presence. His domestics obeyed him by signs, and, when he travelled, the country roads were scoured by ottriders, whose duty it was to protect him from the gaze of the vulgar. He died at his seat of Petworth, Sussex, on 2 Dec. 1748, and he was buried in Salisbury Cathedral, where a statue by Rysbrack surmounts a clumsy Latin epitaph. The following is Macky's description of 1702, the interpolation being Swift's: 'Of a middle stature, well shaped, a very black complexion, a lover of music and poetry, of good judgement [not a grain, hardly common sense], but by reason of a great hesitation in his speech wants expression.' He appears in history as a well-meaning man of slender understanding. He was a member of the Kit-Cat Club, and the portrait by Kneller, in a full-bottomed wig, with the order of the Garter, has been engraved by Simon, and by Holl for Lodge's 'Portraits,' and others. There are two portraits by Lely of the first duchess, which have often been engraved.

Somerset's first wife died on 23 Nov. 1722, leaving Algernon, earl of Hertford, afterwards seventh duke [see below], two other sons, and three daughters: Elizabeth, who married Henry O'Brien, earl of Thomond; Catharine, who married Sir William Wyndham; and Anne, who married Peregrine Osborne, afterwards duke of Leeds. The duke married, secondly, on 4 Feb. 1725-6, Charlotte, third daughter of Daniel Finch, second earl of Nottingham, by whom he had issue: Frances, who married John Manners, marquis of Granby [q. v.], and Charlotte, who married Heneage Finch, earl of Aylesford. The second duchess died at Sutton Court, Chiswick, on 21 Jan. 1778.

The eldest son, ALGERNON SEYMOUR, seventh DUKE (1681-1760), born 11 Nov. 1684, joined the army under Marlborough at Brussels in May 1708, and bore the despatch to the queen after Oudenarde in the following November. Early next year he became colonel of the 15th foot, was promoted captain and colonel of the 2nd troop of horse-guards in 1716, colonel of the regiment in 1740, general of the horse and governor of Minorca from 1737 to 1742. On the death of his mother, in 1722, Lord Hertford wrongly assumed the title of Baron Percy (cf. G. E. C., Peerage); and in 1749, a year after his father's death, he was created Earl of Northumberland. He married in 1713 Frances, eldest daughter and coheir of Henry Thynne (only son and heir of Thomas, first viscount Weymouth). She was a lady of the bedchamber to Queen Caroline, and aspired to the patronage of learning. She corresponded with Henrietta Louisa Fermor, countess of Pomfret [q. v.], and Mrs. Elizabeth Rowe [q. v.] (her letters were edited by William Bingley, 1805, 12mo), entertained Thomson and Shenstone at Alnwick, and in March 1728 was instrumental in procuring the pardon for homicide of Richard Savage [q. v.] Thomson dedicated his poem 'Spring' to her in 1727. She was buried beside her husband, in Westminster Abbey, on 20 July 1754.

Upon the death of the seventh duke, on 7 Feb. 1750, without surviving male issue, a great dispersion of his various titles took place. The barony of Percy went to his daughter, Lady Elizabeth Seymour; the earldom of Northumberland to his son-in-law, Sir Hugh Smithson Percy [q. v.]; the earldom of Egremont (cr. 1749) to his nephew, Sir Charles Wyndham; while a remote cousin, Sir Edward Seymour (1695?-1757), grandson of Sir Edward, the speaker and fourth baronet [q. v.], became eighth duke of Somerset [see under SEYMOUR, EDWARD ADOLPHUS, eleventh DUKE].

[Collins's Peerage, 1770, ii. 469; G. E. C. [Okayne]'s Complete Peerage, s.v. 'Somerset'; De Fonblanque's House of Percy; Luttrell's Brief Hist. Narration; Evelyn's Diary; Reresby's Diary; Dryden's Works, ed. Scott and Saintsbury; Swift's Works, ed. Scott; Memoirs of the Kit-Cat Club, 1821; Boyer's Annals of Queen Anne; Wentworth's Journal, passim; Marlborough Despatches, ed. Murray, iv, passim; Walpole's Correspondence, ed. Cunningham, vols. i. and ii.; Wyon's Hist. of Queen Anne; Lingard's Hist. of England; Aungier's Syon Monastery, p. 113; Jesse's Court of England, 1688-1760; Craik's Romance of the Peerage; Wheatley and Cunningham's London Past and Present; Burke's Romance of the Peerage, i. 12; Collect. Topogr. et Geneal. v. 816.] T. S.

SEYMOUR, EDWARD, first EARL OF HERTFORD and DUKE OF SOMERSET (1506?-1552), the Protector, was the eldest surviving son of Sir John Seymour (1476?-1536) of Wolf Hall, Wiltshire. The Seymours claimed descent from a companion of William the Conqueror, who took his name from St. Maur-sur-Loire in Touraine, and was ancestor of William de St. Maur, who in 1240 held the manors of Penhow and Woundy in Monmouthshire (cf. J. R. Planché in Journ. Archaeol. Assoc. xiii. 327-8). William's great-grandson, Sir Roger de St. Maur, had two sons: John, whose granddaughter conveyed these manors by marriage into the family of Bowlay of Penhow, who bore the Seymour arms; and Sir Roger (d. 1860), who married Cicely, eldest sister and heir of John de Beauchamp, baron Beauchamp de Somerset (d. 1861); she brought to the Seymours the manor of Ilache, Somerset, and her grandson, Roger Seymour, by his marriage with Maud, daughter and heir of Sir William Esturmi or Sturmy, acquired Wolf Hall in Wiltshire. The Protector's father, Sir John, was great-great-grandson of this last Roger. Born about 1476, he succeeded his father in 1492, was knighted by Henry VII for his services against the Cornish rebels at Blackheath in 1497, and was sheriff of Wiltshire in 1508. He was present at the sieges of Tournay and Therouanne in 1513, at the two interviews between Henry VIII and Francis in 1520 and 1532, and died on 21 Dec. 1536. He married Margaret (d. 1550), eldest daughter of Sir Henry Wentworth of Nettlesed, Suffolk; her grandfather, Sir Philip Wentworth, had married Mary, daughter of John, seventh lord Clifford, whose mother Elizabeth was daughter of Henry Percy ('Hotspur') and great-great-granddaughter of Edward III (Notes and Queries, 1st ser. viii. 51-2; Harl. MS. 6177). Sir John Seymour had ten children, of whom, John, the eldest, died unmarried on 15 July 1520, as did two other sons, John and Anthony, and a daughter Margery; Edward the Protector; Henry, who took no part in politics, was executor to his mother in 1550, and died in 1578, leaving three sons from whom there is no issue remaining, and seven daughters, from one of whom, Jane, are descended the barone Rodney; Thomas, baron Seymour of Sudeley [q. v.]; Jane Seymour [see JANE]; Elizabeth, who married, first, Sir Anthony Ughtred, secondly, in August 1587, Cromwell's son Gregory, and thirdly William Paulet, first marquis of Winchester [q. v.]; and Dorothy who married Sir Clement Smith (inscription in Bsdwyn Magna Church printed in AUBREY, pp. 875-6).

From the inscription on an anonymous portrait at Sudeley (Cat. Tudor Exhib. No. 198), Edward appears to have been born about 1508, and is said to have been educated first at Oxford, and then at Cambridge (Wood, Athena Oxon. i. 210; COOPER, Athena Cant. i. 107). In 1514 he was retained as 'enfant d'honneur' to Mary Tudor on her marriage with Louis XII of France. On 15 July 1517 he was associated with his father in a grant of the constablership of Brietol. He was probably with his father in attendance upon Charles V on his visit to England in 1522, as Chapuys afterwards mentioned Seymour as having been 'in Charles's service' (Letters and Papers, x. 1089). He joined the expedition of the Duke of Suffolk which landed at Calais on 24 Aug. 1523, and was present at the capture of Bray, Roye, and Montdidier, being knighted by Suffolk at Roye on 1 Nov. In the following year he became an esquire of the king's household. On 12 Jan. 1524-5 he was placed on the commission for the peace in Wiltshire, and in the same year became master of the horse to the Duke of Richmond. In July 1527 he accompanied Wolsey on his embassy to the French king (Chron. of Calais, p. 37), and in 1528 was granted some lands of the monasteries dissolved in consequence of Wolsey's visitation. On 25 March 1529 he was made steward of the manors of Henstridge, Somerset, and Charlton, Wiltshire, and in 1530 he received with his brother-in-law, Sir Anthony Ughtred, Wolsey's manors of Kexby, Leppington, and Barthorps, all in Yorkshire. On 12 Sept. following he was appointed esquire of the body to Henry VIII, who showed him much favour, borrowing from, and occasionally lending, him money (see Letters and Papers, vols. iv. v. and vi. passim). In 1532, Seymour and his father accompanied Henry to Boulogne to meet Francis I. In the following year he became involved in a dispute with Arthur Plantagenet, viscount Lisle [q. v.], and his stepson, John Dudley, afterwards duke of Northumberland [q. v.], about some lands in Somerset, which lasted many years, and is the subject of innumerable letters in the Record Office (cf. Wood, Letters of Illustrious Ladies, iii. 41; GATRONER, Letters and Papers, vols. vii-xii.) In March 1534-5 he was granted various lands in Hampshire belonging to the convent of the Holy Trinity, Christchurch, London, and in the following October Henry VIII visited him at his manor of Elvetham in the same county. In March 1535-6 he was made a gentleman of the privy chamber, and a few days later, with his wife Anne and his sister Jane, was installed in the palace at Greenwich in apartments which the king could reach through a private passage (Letters and Papers, x. 601). On 5 June, a week after his sister's marriage to the king, Seymour was created Viscount Beauchamp of Hache, Somerset. Two days later he received a grant of numerous manors in Wiltshire, including Ambresbury, Easton Priory, Chippenham, and Maiden Bradley (one of the seats of the present Duke of Somerset). On 7 July he was made governor and captain of Jersey, and in August chancellor of North Wales. He had livery of his father's lands in the following year, was on 30 Jan. granted the manor of Muchelnsy, Somerset, and on 22 May sworn of the privy council. In the same month he was on the commission appointed to try Lords Darcy and Hussey for their share in the 'pilgrimage of Elizabeth at Edward VI's christening (WHORWORTH, Chron. i. 68), and three days later was created Earl of Hertford.

The death of Queen Jane was naturally a blow to Hertford's influence, and in the following year he was described as 'young and wise,' but 'of small power' (Letters and Papers, XIII. ii. 732). In December he was put on commissions for the trial of the Marquis of Exeter, Lord Montagu, Sir Geoffrey Pole, and others; and in March 1539 he was sent to provide for the defence and fortification of Calais and Guisnes. He returned in April, and on the 16th was granted Chester Place, outside Temple Bar, London. In August Henry VIII and Cromwell spent four days (9-12) with him at Wolf Hall (Wilts Archaeol. Mag. xv. App. No. iv). In the same month he received a grant of the Charterhouse at Sheen (WHORWORTH, Chron. i. 105). In December he met Anne of Cleves at Calais, and returned with her to London; he wrote to Cromwell that nothing had pleased him so much as this marriage since the birth of Prince Edward (Letters and Papers, XIV. i. 1275).

Cromwell's fall—which, according to the Spanish 'Chronicle of Henry VIII,' Hertford instigated—in the following year did not check Hertford's continuous rise in Henry's favour; and Norfolk, now the most powerful member of the council, sought to purchase his friendship by a marriage between his daughter, the Duchess of Richmond, and Hertford's brother Thomas. Throughout 1540 Hertford took an active part in the proceedings of the council, and on 9 Jan. 1540-1 he was elected a knight of the Garter. A few days later he was sent on a fruitless mission to arrange the boundaries of the English Pale in France with the French commissioners (Corr. de Marillac, pp. 267, 268-8; State Papers, viii. 510, 523-80). He then proceeded in February to inspect and report on the defences at Calais (Proc. Privy Council, ed. Nicolas, vii. 130). During Henry's progress in the north from July to November, Hertford, Cranmer, and Audley had the principal management of affairs in London (State Papers, i. 680-90), and in November the earl and the archbishop were the recipients of the charges against Catherine Howard (cf. Chronicle of Henry VIII, ed. Hume, 1889, pp. 82-4). In September 1542 Hertford was appointed warden of the Scottish marches. He served there for a few weeks (21 Oct. to 7 Dec.) under Norfolk, but in November he requested to be recalled on the ground that 'the country knew not him, nor he them' (State Papers, v. 222), and Rutland took his place. In December Hertford resumed attendance on the king (ib. ix. 257). On 28 Dec. he appears as lord high admiral, a post which he almost immediately relinquished in favour of John Dudley, viscount Lisle, and in January 1542-3 he was lord great chamberlain. On 1 April he took an active part in procuring the conviction and imprisonment of Norfolk's son, the Earl of Surrey, for eating flesh in Lent and riotous proceedings (Barst, Deux Gentilhommes Poètes, p. 269). During that year Henry again visited Hertford at Wolf Hall.

Meanwhile in December 1543 the Scots formed a new alliance with France, and declared the treaty with England null and void. On 5 March 1543-4 Hertford was appointed lieutenant-general in the north. He was ordered to proclaim Henry guardian of the infant Scots queen and protector of the realm, and to accuse Cardinal Beaton of causing the war between the two nations (proclamations in Addit. MS. 32854, ff. 49, 58). In the middle of April a deputation of Scottish protestants waited on Hertford with a proposal to raise a force to aid in the invasion and assassinate the cardinal; but Hertford declined to assent on his own authority, and sent the deputation on to Henry. At the end of the month his army embarked at Berwick, and on 8 May the fleet arrived in the Firth of Forth. Next day ten thousand men landed at Leith, and Blackness Castle was taken. On the 5th Lord Evers, with four thousand English horse, arrived from Berwick. The provost offered Hertford the keys of Edinburgh if he would allow all who desired to depart with their effects; but the earl demanded unconditional surrender, proclaiming that he had come to punish the Scots 'for their detestable falsehood, to declare and show the force of his highness's sword to all such as would resist him.' The Scots replied defiantly. On the following day Sir Christopher Morris [q. v.] blew in Canongate, and for two days the capital was pillaged without resistance. The English then returned to Leith, seizing the ships in the harbour and lading them with spoil. By the 18th they were back at Berwick, having accomplished no permanent result except further exasperating the Scots and strengthening the French alliance (Hertford's correspondence dealing with this expedition is in Addit. MS. 32854).

A month later Hertford returned to London, and on 9 July he was appointed lieutenant of the kingdom under the queen-regent during Henry's absence in France (State Papers, i. 766; REMER, xv. 39-40).

On 18 Aug., however, he joined Henry at Hardelot Castle, near Boulogne, and was present at the capture of that town on 14 Sept. Hertford, indeed, is said to have bribed the French commander De Vervins to surrender the town for a large sum of money (Mémoires du Maréchal de Vieilleville, ed. 1822, i. 152-3; NOTT, Surrey's Works, p. lxix). Five days later Charles V secretly concluded the peace of Crêpy with the French, leaving his English allies still at war, and on 18 Oct. a conference was opened at Calais by the three powers to arrange terms. Hertford was the principal English representative, but no results followed, and on the 26th he and Gardiner were despatched to Brussels to endeavour to extract a definite declaration of policy from the emperor (State Papers, x. 63-6, 119-86, 147-60; Addit. MS. 26114, ff. 312, 315). After much procrastination, Charles granted them three interviews, the last on 17 Nov.; but their efforts to keep him to the terms of his alliance with England were unavailing, and on the 21st they were recalled (State Papers, 202-7 et sqq.) England now made preparations to carry on the war single-handed. On 14 Jan. 1544-5 Hertford was sent to survey the fortifications of Guisnes, and a few days later he took command at Boulogne, which the French made a desperate effort to recapture. On 26 Jan. Marshal De Biez encamped before it with fourteen thousand men, while those at Hertford's command were but half that number. Nevertheless, before dawn on 6 Feb. the English sallied out with four thousand foot and seven hundred horse, and took the French by surprise. A panic seized them, and they fled, leaving their stores, ammunition, and artillery in the hands of the English (HEDDERLEY, Life and Reign of Henry VIII, ed. 1719, p. 250).

This brilliant exploit rendered Boulogne safe for the time, but the defeat at Ancrum Muir, on 17 Feb., decided Henry to send Hertford once more to the Scottish border. On 2 May he was appointed lieutenant-general in the north in succession to Shrewsbury (RYMER, xv. 72), but, owing to the smallness of his force and lack of supplies, Hertford suggested a postponement of the projected invasion until August. Throughout the summer he remained at or near Newcastle, providing against the contingency of a Scots or French invasion. At length, on 6 Sept., he crossed the border; on the 13th he was at Kelso, and a few days later at Jedburgh. A list, which he sent to the government, of monasteries and castles burnt marks his course. He met with no opposition; but his invasion was only a border foray on a large scale, and on the 27th he was back at Newcastle (State Papers, v. 448-52; Hamilton Papers, vol. ii.). On 10 Oct. he received a summons to parliament, which met in November, and on the following day he set out for London. From the 24th until the following March he was in attendance at the council. On 21 March he was appointed lieutenant and captain-general of Boulogne and the Boulonnais in succession to Surrey, who had failed to hold his own against the French. He reached Calais on the 23rd (State Papers, xi. 60), and on 4 April was commissioned lieutenant-general of the army in France. In the same month he was appointed to treat for peace, which was concluded on 7 June. On the 31st he was again in London. On 19 Sept. he was once more sent to Boulogne to carry out the terms of the destruction of the fortifications (Du SAILLY, Corr. Politique, 1888, pp. 31, 34; State Papers, i. 877, 879); but in October he was back at Windsor (Acts P. C., ed. Dasent, i. 535). From that time to the end of Henry's reign Hertford was constant in his attendance at court and council.

These few months witnessed the momentous struggle for the succession to power during the coming minority of Edward VI. The numerous attainders of Henry's reign had left Norfolk and Hertford face to face as the most powerful nobles in the kingdom. The former, with his son Surrey, headed the conservative party, while Hertford, though he was far too cautious to give open expression to his views, was known to favour further steps in the direction of ecclesiastical reform. This divergence of view was accentuated by personal jealousy between Surrey and Hertford, who had recently been called in to retrieve his rival's military blunders. Surrey vowed vengeance, and, hating Hertford as an upstart, he rejected his father's proposals for matrimonial alliances between his children and Hertford's two daughters, as well as between the Duchess of Richmond and Hertford's brother Thomas. The hope of conciliation thus failed, but the struggle between the rivals, which might have led to civil war, was averted by the dramatic fall of the Howards in January 1546-7 [see HOWARD, HENRY, EARL OF SURREY, 1517?-1547, and HOWARD, THOMAS II, EARL OF SURREY, 1473-1554]. Hertford took an active part in Surrey's trial (WRIOTHESLEY, Chron. i. 177; BARST, p. 358); he was commissioned to convey Henry's assent to the bill of attainder against Norfolk, and he acquired a share of the Howards' property; but there is not sufficient evidence to show that their fall was due to his machinations, and he did nothing to molest Norfolk after Henry's death.

That event took place at 2 A.M. on Friday, 23 Jan. 1546-7; Hertford and Paget had spent the previous day in conversation with the king, they were present at his death, received his last commands, and had possession of his will. But Hertford must have already determined to set aside its provisions, and in an interview with Paget in the gallery immediately before Henry's death, and another an hour afterwards, he persuaded him to abet his bold coup d'état, promising to be guided by Paget's advice. They decided to keep the king's death a secret for the present, and to publish only so much of his will as seemed convenient; and then the earl hurried down to Hertford to get possession of the young king. On the way back, at Enfield on the 30th, Sir Anthony Browne (d. 1548) [q.v.], though 'inclined to the old religion, gave his frank consent to Hertford being Protector, thinking it to be the surest kind of government' (Lit. Remains of Edward VI., p. ccxlvii). On the same day, in a letter to the council, Hertford adopted the style 'we,' and on Monday the 31st he arrived with Edward at the Tower. Henry's death was then made known, and on the same day Paget proposed in the council that Hertford should have the protectorate. The council was divided: the reformers were represented by Cranmer, Hertford, and Lisle; the conservatives by Tunstall, Wriothesley, and Browne. Gardiner was excluded according to the terms of Henry's suspicious will; Browne had already given in his adherence to Hertford, but the chancellor Wriothesley strongly opposed the scheme. Paget's influence, however, prevailed, and the council gave Hertford 'the chief place among them,' with 'the name and title of Protector of all the realms and domains of the king's majesty, and governor of his most royal person,' adding the express condition that he was to act only 'with the advice and consent of the rest of the executors' (Acts of the Privy Council, ii. 4-7). On 2 Feb. he was appointed high steward of England for the coronation of Edward; on the 10th he was granted the office of treasurer of the exchequer, and that of earl marshal, which had been forfeited by Norfolk. Five days later he was created Baron Seymour of Hache, and on the 16th Duke of Somerset. On 6 March Wriothesley was removed from the chancellorship on the ground that he had used the great seal without a warrant (ib. ii. 48-59). Six days later Somerset rendered his position independent of the council by obtaining a patent as governor and protector, in which he was empowered to act with or without their advice, and 'to do anything which a governor of the king's person or protector of the realm ought to do' (ib. ii. 63-4, 67-74). He had now attained to almost royal authority; in a form of prayer which he used, he spoke of himself as 'caused by Providence to rule,' and he went so far as to address the king of France as 'brother.'

As the first protestant ruler of England, Somerset at once set about introducing radical religious reforms. His numerous letters, preserved in the British Museum, throw little light on what convictions he had reached during Henry's reign, or how he had been induced to adopt them, but by Henry's death he had become a 'rank Calvinist' (Nicholas Pocock in Engl. Hist. Rev. July 1895, p. 418), and he soon entered into correspondence with the Genevan reformer. 'From the moment of Henry's death there was a systematic attempt made by the men of the new learning, headed at first by Somerset . . . gradually to get rid of catholic doctrine' (ib. p. 438). 'There is really no other account to be given of the gradual changes that culminated in the second prayer-book of 1552 . . . than that Somerset was supreme, and exercised for a few years the same arbitrary sway that the late king had brought to bear upon the parliament when the Act of Six Articles was passed' (Church Quarterly Rev. October 1892, p. 38). Cranmer, whose leanings were then Lutheran, was a 'mere tool in his hands' (ib. pp. 41, 42, 56). The Protector secretly encouraged books of extreme protestant views (cf. The V Abominable Blasphemies contained in the Masse, 1548, anon. printed by H. Powell); and in the preface to the new communion office (March 1547-8), which Somerset almost certainly wrote himself, he hinted plainly at further sweeping reforms. But in his public procedure he was compelled to observe more caution. The first of his ecclesiastical acts was to compel all bishops to exercise their office durante beneplacito (6 Feb. 1546-7), and their position as mere state officials was emphasised by an act in the following November, ordering that their appointment should be made by letters patent. An ecclesiastical visitation followed for the removal of images, assertion of the royal supremacy, and the enforcement of the use of English in the church services; for their opposition to this measure Gardiner and Bonner were imprisoned in June. In July appeared the book of homilies, and in November parliament authorised the administration of the communion in both kinds, and granted all colleges, chantries, and free chapels to the king. Early in 1548 a proclamation was issued against ceremonies, and at Easter a new communion office was published; in July an English version of the Psalms and litany followed, and in November began the visitation of the universities of Oxford and Cambridge, of the latter of which Somerset had been elected chancellor in 1547. In January 1549 was passed the Act of Uniformity; tithes were also regulated by parliament, and the marriage of priests allowed.

Meanwhile Somerset turned his attention towards the completion of the marriage between Edward and Mary of Scotland. He had been identified more prominently than any other statesman with this policy during the late reign, and Henry had enforced it upon him during his last moments. Religious even more than political considerations urged Somerset in the same direction. He dreamt of the union of England and Scotland into one state, which under his guidance would become distinctively protestant and act as the protagonist of the Reformation in Europe. At first he avoided all reference to the feudal claim which Henry VIII had revived in 1542, and sought to win over the Scots to the projected union with England by promising free trade between the two kingdoms, autonomy for Scotland, and the substitution of Great Britain for the words England and Scotland. France encouraged the Scots to resist, and during the summer the Protector collected a large army at Berwick. In August the French captured the castle of St. Andrew, where a body of Scots protestants had held out in the English cause, and Somerset's pretensions united all Scotland in opposition. In the last week of August he reached Berwick; a fleet commanded by Clinton accompanied the army, which marched along the coast. On Sunday, 4 Sept., Somerset crossed the Tweed; passing Dunbar without waiting to attack it, he came in sight of Musselburgh on the evening of the 8th. There the Scots were encamped in numbers greatly superior to the English; on their left was the sea commanded by the English fleet, on their right was a marsh, and in front was the river Esk. The position was almost impregnable, but the Scots did not wait to be attacked. Before dawn on the 10th they crossed the Esk. Four thousand Irish who charged the English right were scattered by the fire from the fleet, but the Scottish right almost succeeded in occupying the heights on the English left. Grey's horse broke against the Scottish infantry and fled, but in their pursuit the Scots came upon the English men-at-arms and Italian musketeers, while the English cavalry formed once more and charged. A panic seized the Scots, they broke and fled, and the rout soon became a massacre; many thousand Scots were killed, the English loss being, it is said, only two hundred (cf. DE SMYDE, p. 203). Decisive as was this battle of Musselburgh or Pinkie Cleugh—the last fought between England and Scotland as independent kingdoms—and greatly though it strengthened Somerset's personal position, it postponed further than ever the attainment of his objects. Leith was burnt on the 11th, but Mary was removed to Stirling; while the English army, provisioned only for a month, was compelled to retreat (TUDOR, Papiers d'Etat relatifs à l'Histoire d'Ecosse, Bannatyne Club, vol. i.; KNOX, Works, Bannatyne Club, i. 209, 213; The Complaynt of Scotland, Early Engl. Text Soc.; PATTEN, Expedition into Scotland, 1548).

Somerset reached London on 8 Oct. (WRIGHTSLAY, Chron. i. 186), and was received with fresh marks of honour. He declined the proposal of the city of London to welcome him with a triumphal procession, but his designation became 'Edward, by the grace of God, duke of Somerset, &c., and he was allowed a special seat in the House of Lords above the other peers. Parliament met on 4 Nov., and, besides ecclesiastical reforms and other measures for the regeneration of morals, proceeded to embody in statutes Somerset's wishes for a relaxation of Henry's repressive system. All treasons created since 1352 were abolished; the six articles, the acts against lollards, and the severer clauses of the Act of Supremacy were repealed; and the Protector made an ineffectual attempt to repress vagrancy by enabling justices to condemn incurable offenders to two years' slavery, and in the last resort to slavery for life. It was probably in order to find occupation for the unemployed, as well as to afford an asylum for protestant refugees, that he established a colony of foreign weavers on his estates at Glastonbury (cf. Acts P.C. iii. 415, 490; KNOX, Works, iv. 42, 564; STRYPE, Eccl. Mem. ii. i. 378). The last act of parliament dealt with the status of the Protector, but seems never to have passed the great seal. The fact that it made his tenure depend upon the king's pleasure instead of the duration of his minority seems to indicate that it was a machination of Somerset's enemies (see Archæologia, xxx. 363–89).

But foreign affairs claimed a large share of the Protector's attention, and he retained their management almost exclusively in his own hands, aided by Paget and the two secretaries of state, Sir Thomas Smith and Sir William Petre. At the beginning of Edward's reign the pope had urged Charles V to support Mary's claims by invasion, and, as a counterpoise, the council opened communications for a league with France and the German princes in March (Acts P.C. ii. 47, 60); but the proposal did not prosper (cf. Dr SELVN, Corr. Politique, 1548-9, ed. 1883, passim). Somerset's designs on Scotland inevitably offended France, while the irritation was constantly growing through the bickerings about the fortifications of Boulogne. Though war did not formally break out, acts of hostility frequently occurred. The Protector was still sanguine of accomplishing the marriage between Edward and Mary. On 5 Feb. 1547-8 he issued 'An Epistle or Exhortacion to Unitie and Peace, sent from the Lorde Protector . . . to the Nobilitie . . . of Scotlande' (printed by R. Wolfe, 1548, 8vo), pointing out the advantages of the English proposals and attributing the cause of the war to Arran and his advisers. The Scots protestants were naturally on Somerset's side, and by means of bribery he maintained a party among the nobles; but he failed to prevent the conclusion of a marriage treaty between Mary and the dauphin of France, and in June a French force sailed for Scotland from Brest. In order to anticipate it, Somerset had directed William, thirteenth baron Grey de Wilton [q. v.], and Sir Thomas Palmer (d. 1553) [q. v.] to cross the border on 18 April. They took and fortified Haddington, where they left a garrison of two thousand five hundred men, and, after wasting the country round Edinburgh, returned to Berwick. In June Somerset sent Sir Thomas Smith to the emperor, and to raise two thousand German mercenaries; but Charles contented himself with fair words, while the French fleet carried off Mary to France, and the Scots recovered Home Castle and closely besieged Haddington in August.

The marriage of Mary with the dauphin completed the failure of Somerset's Scottish policy, and in the following autumn his position was menaced by the intrigues of his brother the admiral [see SEYMOUR, THOMAS, BARON SEYMOUR OF SUDLEY]. The Protector had naturally resented his brother's marriage with Catherine Parr, but he wrote him an affectionate letter on the occasion of his daughter's birth (31 Aug.), and endeavoured to divert him by persuasion from his reckless courses. Failing in this, he sent for him early in January 1548-9, but Thomas was contumacious, and the Protector then left him to his fate. According to the privy council register, he 'desired for natural pity's sake licence at the passing of the bill [of attainder] to be away' (ii. 260), and assented to that measure with the greatest reluctance; while Queen Elizabeth subsequently stated that the admiral's life would have been saved had not the council dissuaded the Protector from granting him an interview. He was present, however, at each reading of the bill of attainder in the House of Lords (see Lords' Journals, i. 345 et seq.; cf. TYTTER, i. 150-1). In any case, his brother's fall was a fatal blow to Somerset's authority, and involved him in much popular odium (cf. HAYWARD, Edward the Sixth).

Troubles now began to gather thickly round the Protector; the Scots took Haddington (September 1549) and other castles held by the English. Somerset projected another invasion, but the German mercenaries refused to serve without an advance of pay, and the exchequer was not only empty, but deep in debt. The French were pressing hard on Boulogne; the outworks of Blackness, Boulogneberg, and Newhaven (Ambleteuse) fell one after another, and on 8 Aug. war with France was declared (Dr SELVE, p. 410; WHIOTHERSLEY, ii. 20). The religious innovations created a widespread discontent, which was intensified by the economic condition of the country. The depreciation of the currency and the increase of enclosures and conversion of arable into pasture lands caused widespread distress which Somerset's efforts failed to abate (see A Discourse of the Common Weal of this Realm of England, ed. Lamond, 1898). He appointed a commission to inquire into abuses arising out of the decay of tillage and frequency of enclosures (June 1548), but three bills introduced to remedy the evil were all rejected in the following session of parliament [see HALES, JOHN, d. 1571]. Somerset thereupon issued a proclamation in May 1549, by which all who had enclosed lands were commanded to restore them. This produced no effect except to exasperate the landowners against him, while the commons, getting no redress, rose in revolt in Oxfordshire and Buckinghamshire. The rising was soon put down by Lord Grey, but in June a rebellion broke out in Devon and Cornwall, followed by another under Robert Kett [q. v.] in Norfolk. The former was actuated by religious motives, and was suppressed by John Russell, first earl of Bedford [q. v.]. The Norfolk rebels laid more stress on social and economic grievances, and their revolt was more serious. Somerset thought of taking the command against them himself, but it was finally given to Warwick, who crushed the rebellion in August.

This success encouraged Warwick to begin intriguing against the Protector, and he found ready listeners among many of the council. Wriothesley (now Earl of Southampton) had never forgiven Somerset his ejection from the chancellorship, and, like other adherents of the old religion, he thought that nothing but good could come of Somerset's fall. On the other hand many of the reforming party had grievances against the Protector; even his stout adherent, Paget, warned him against his arrogance and ambition, and the folly of 'having so many irons in the fire.' At the same time the rapacity with which he seized on church lands and the fortune he acquired for himself deprived him of popular sympathy, and added to the irritation the council felt at such arbitrary acts as making a stamp of the king's signature and erecting a court of requests in his own house. They knew, moreover, that the authority he enjoyed was usurped contrary to Henry's will. Failure at home and abroad gave Warwick his opportunity. In September he waited on Somerset with two hundred captains who had served in suppressing the late rebellions, and demanded extra pay for their services. Somerset refused, and Warwick then enlisted their support in his attempt to overthrow him (Chron. of Henry VIII, pp. 185-6). Secret meetings were held at the houses of the disaffected councillors. Somerset heard of these gatherings while at Hampton Court with Cranmer, Paget, Cecil, Petre, Sir Thomas Smith, and Sir John Thynne, all his devoted adherents. In the first few days of October he issued leaflets urging the people to rise in his defence and that of the king. His enemies, he asserted, wished to depose him because 'we the poore comens being injured by the extorcious gentylmon had our pardon this yere by the . . . goodness of the lorde Protector, for whom let us fyght, for he lovith all just and true gentilmen which do no extorcion, and also us the poore commynaltis of Englande' (Acts P. C. ii. 330-6). Ten thousand men are said to have responded to this call (Chron. Henry VIII, p. 186), and Somerset sent his son, Sir Edward Seymour, to Russell and Herbert, who were then returning from the west with the army that had suppressed the rebellion, entreating them to come to the rescue of the king. On the 6th he despatched Petre to London to inquire the meaning of the council's proceedings. There Warwick's adherents were in session at his residence, Ely House, Holborn. They had drawn up an indictment of Somerset's rule, and were on the point of setting out to lay it before the Protector. On the receipt of Petre's message threatening to arrest them if they proceeded to Hampton Court, they determined to remain in London. On the same day they requested the support of the mayor and aldermen, to whom Rich described the Protector's evil deeds, and sent out letters to various nobles summoning them, with their adherents, to London. Petre remained with the council, and Somerset started that night for Windsor with the king. Next day the council wrote to Cranmer and Paget requiring their adherence. On the 8th the city gave the council its support, the Tower was secured, Russell and Herbert inclined to the same side, and fifteen thousand men gathered in London to support the council (Chron. Henry VIII, p. 189). Somerset saw that his cause was lost, and promised submission. On the 10th the council wrote ordering the detention of Sir Thomas Smith, Sir Michael Stanhope (the Protector's brother-in-law), Sir John Thynne (the manager of his estates), and others. On the 12th they went down to Windsor, and on the 14th Somerset was sent to the Tower.

Early in January 1549-50 an account of the proceedings taken against him was presented to parliament, and the charges were embodied in thirty-one articles. Somerset made a full confession and threw himself on the mercy of the council; on the 14th he was deposed from the protectorate by act of parliament, deprived of all his offices and of lands to the value of 2,000*l*. While in the Tower he solaced himself by reading devotional works, such as Wermueller's 'Spyrytuall and most precyouse Pearle,' translated by Coverdale, which was lent to him in manuscript, and for which he wrote a preface; it was published in the same year (London, 8vo), and subsequently passed through many editions (see Brit. Mus. Cat. and HAZLITT, Collections). He is also said to have translated out of French a letter written to him by Calvin, and printed in the same year, but no copy is known to be extant. On 6 Feb. he was set at liberty (Acts P. C. ii. 383; Wriothesley, ii. 23-4), and on the 18th received a free pardon. On 10 April he was again admitted of the privy council, and on 14 May was made a gentleman of the king's chamber. He resumed his attendances at the council on 24 April, taking precedence of all the other members, and rarely missed a meeting for the next eighteen months. Three days later his property, except what had already been disposed of, was restored to him; and on 3 June his eldest daughter, Anne, was married to Warwick's eldest son, Viscount Lisle.

Although an opportunity of recovering his position seemed to be thus offered Somerset, the ambition of his rival Warwick rendered his ultimate ruin inevitable. A public slight was put on him when, on the death of his mother on 18 Oct. 1550, the council refused to go into mourning. On 10 May 1551, however, he was made lord-lieutenant of Buckinghamshire and Berkshire, in August he put down an insurrection in Sussex, and in face of the ill success of the new administration the influence of Somerset's party seemed for a moment to revive. As early as February 1550-1 some members of parliament had started the idea of again making him Protector, but a dissolution brought the scheme to nothing. Somerset endeavoured to procure Gardiner's release from the Tower, and to prevent the withdrawal of the Princess Mary's license to practise her own religion. Paget and Arundel gave him their support, and popular feeling was strongly in his favour. With this encouragement, Somerset seems to have meditated seizing his three chief enemies, Warwick, Northampton, and Pembroke, who, on their side, determined to destroy him. During the whole of September 1551 Somerset was prevented from attending the council by sickness in his household, and probably during this period the designs against him were matured. On 4 Oct. he appeared once more by their order at the council; on the same day Warwick became Duke of Northumberland, and his adherents were likewise advanced a step in the peerage. Three days later Sir Thomas Palmer (d. 1553) [q. v.] revealed to Warwick and the king a plot, which he described as having been formed in April by Somerset, Arundel, Paget, and himself, with the object of raising the country and murdering Warwick. On the 11th, Northumberland and Palmer again discussed the matter, and on the same day the council ordered an inquiry into the amount of Somerset's debts to the king. This roused Somerset's suspicions, but he attended the council as usual on the 18th. A few hours later he was arrested and sent to the Tower. The duchess, Lord Grey, and others of his adherents, followed him thither next day; and finally, Palmer, who had been left at liberty for ten days after giving his information, was arrested. On the 19th the council communicated to the corporation the baseless story that Somerset had plotted to destroy the city of London, seize the Tower and the Isle of Wight (WHIOTHESLAY, ii. 56-7). He was also accused of endeavouring to secure for himself and his heirs the succession to the crown (cf. 'A Tract agaynst Edward, Duke of Somerset,' extant among the Loseley MSS., Hist. MSS. Comm. 7th Rep. App. p. 607). For six weeks Somerset remained in the Tower while evidence was being collected against him. There can be no doubt that he had meditated supplanting Northumberland, but the plot against the duke's life rests on no satisfactory evidence. Apart from the improbabilities of Palmer's story (see TYTLER, ii. 1-70), there is the direct statement of Renard that both Northumberland and Palmer confessed before their death that they had concocted the evidence (FROUDE, v. 36n.) On Tuesday, 1 Dec., at 5 A.M. Somerset was conveyed by water from the Tower to Westminster Hall, to stand trial by his peers. The charge of treason broke down, but he was condemned for felony, and sentenced to be hanged; the people 'supposing he had been clerely quit, when they see the ave of the Tower put downe, made such a shryke and castinge up of caps, that it was heard into the Long Acre beyonde Charinge Crosse,' and on his way back to the Tower they 'cried God save him all the way' (WHIOTHESLAY, ii. 63; cf. SROW, p. 607). He was beheaded on Tower Hill on Friday, 22 Jan. 1551-2, between 8 and 9 A.M.: to prevent a tumult, orders were given that the people should remain indoors till ten o'clock, but an hour before the execution Tower Hill was crowded. Somerset addressed the people in a few dignified words, rejoicing in the work that he had been able to do in the cause of religion and urging them to follow in the same course. While he was yet speaking a panic seized the crowd, and in the midst of it Sir Anthony Browne rode up. A cry of 'pardon' was raised, but Somerset was not deceived, and, protesting his loyalty to the king, he laid his head on the block, while those nearest the scaffold pressed forward to dip their handkerchiefs in his blood (ELLIS, Orig. Letters, 2nd ser. ii. 216). He was buried in St. Peter's Chapel in the Tower, on the north side of the aisle, between Anne Boleyn and Catherine Howard. In the Stowe collection (No. 1066) in the British Museum is a manuscript calendar used by Somerset in the Tower, inside one cover of which he wrote some pious reflections the day before his execution; on the other cover is the signature of his daughter-in-law, Catherine Seymour [q. v.], who also used it while in the Tower. As he was attainted for felony and not for treason, his lands and dignities were not thereby affected, but an act of parliament was passed on 12 April following declaring them forfeited and confirming his attainder (Lords' Journals, i. 425).

Somerset occupies an important place in English history. Strength of conviction and purity of morale admirably fitted him to lead a religious movement. He did more than any other man to give practical effect to the protestant revolution, and his immediate successors could only follow on the lines he laid down. Alike in his conception of a union between England and Scotland, in his feeling for the poorer classes of his community, and in his sincere adoption of protestant principles, he gave evidence of lofty aims. As a general he was successful in every military operation he undertook. But he was too little of an opportunist to be a successful ruler, and he failed to carry out his objects because he lacked patience, hated compromise, and consistently underrated the strength of the forces opposed to him. Ambition entered largely into his motives, and his successful usurpation showed him to be capable of prompt and resolute audacity. He had as high a conception of the royal prerogative as any Tudor, but he used it to mitigate the severity of Henry VIII's government. The mildness of his rule earned him a deeply felt popularity, and under his sway there was less persecution than there was again for a century. Naturally warm-hearted and affable, the possession of power rendered him peevish and overbearing; but, like his brother Thomas, he possessed handsome features and many personal graces. A portrait, by Holbein, belongs to the Duke of Northumberland; two anonymous portraits are at Sudley Castle; another belongs to Mrs. Cunliffe; and two more, also anonymous, belonged in 1867 to William Digby Seymour [q. v.] and Mr. Reginald Cholmondeley respectively (see Cat. First Loan Exhib. Noe. 188, 174). The portrait by Holbein has been engraved by Houbraken, R. White, and others (see BROMLEY, p. 10).

The chief blot on Somerset's career is his rapacity in profiting by the dissolution of monasteries, the abolition of chantries, and sale of church lands. The estates he inherited brought him 2,400*l.* a year, those he acquired between 1540 and 1547 added 2,000*l.* to his income, and between 1547 and 1552 it increased by another 3,000*l.*; the total 7,400*l.* would be worth at least ten times as much in modern currency (Wilts Archaeol. Mag. xv. 189). The number and extent of his manors can be gathered from a list of the 'Grants of the Forfeited Lands of Edward, Duke of Somerset,' and 'Cartæ Edwardi, Ducis Somerset,' both printed by Sir Thomas Phillipps, London, 1866, fol. His most famous possession was Somerset House in the Strand, which he commenced building very soon after Henry's death; two inns belonging to the sees of Worcester and Lichfield were pulled down to make room for it, and, to furnish materials, the north aisle of St. Paul's Cathedral, containing the 'Dance of Death,' and the priory of St. John of Jerusalem, Clerkenwell, were demolished. Somerset took great interest in its construction, and, as Knox lamented (Works, iii. 176), preferred watching the masons to listening to sermons. Somerset House was occupied by Henrietta Maria, who added to it her famous Roman catholic chapel; by Catherine of Braganza, and by Queen Charlotte until 1775, when it was pulled down; the present building was finished in 1786 (WHEATLEY and CUNNINGHAM, London Past and Present, iii. 268-73).

Somerset was twice married, first, about 1527, to Catherine (d. before 1540), daughter and coheir of Sir William Fillol of Woodlands in Horton, Dorset, and Fillol's Hall in Langton Wash, Essex. She is erroneously said to have been divorced in consequence of her misconduct with Somerset's father (cf. manuscript note in 'Vincent's Baronage' in the College of Arms, quoted by COVINGTON, Peerage, p. 249). By her Seymour had two sons: John, who was sent to the Tower on 16 Oct. 1531 with his father, died there on 19 Dec. 1552, and was buried in Savoy hospital (MACHYN, Diary, pp. 10, 27, 826); and Edward (1529-1593), who was knighted at the battle of Pinkie on 10 Sept. 1547, was restored in blood by act of parliament, passed on 29 March 1553, before his half-brothers (Lords' Journals, i. 441, 442, 445), settled at Berry Pomeroy, Devonshire, and was ancestor of Sir Edward Seymour [q. v.], the speaker, and of the present dukes of Somerset. Somerset's second wife was Anne (1497-1587), daughter of Sir Edward Stanhope of Sudbury, Suffolk, by his wife Elizabeth, great-granddaughter of William Bourchier, earl of Eu, by Anne, sole heiress of Thomas of Woodstock, youngest son of Edward III. She was a woman of great pride, and her disputes as to precedence with Catherine Parr are said to have originally caused the estrangement between the two Seymours and most of the duke's misfortunes and errors (LORD, Portraits). Surrey, in spite of his antipathy to her husband, paid her attention, which she scornfully rejected, and addressed to her his ode 'On a lady who refused to dance with him' (BAST, pp. 370-1; Gent. Mag. 1845, i. 371-81). She was imprisoned with her husband, subsequently married his steward Francis Newdigate, died on 16 April 1537, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Two anonymous portraits of her belong respectively to the Duke of Northumberland and Earl Stanhope. By her Somerset had four sons: (1) Edward, born on 12 Oct. 1537, died before May 1539; (2) Edward Seymour, earl of Hertford [q. v.]; (3) Henry, born in 1540, who was appointed in 1588 admiral of the squadron of the narrow seas, and kept close watch on the Duke of Parma off the coast of the Netherlands; on 27 July he took an important share in the battle off Gravelines, and subsequently kept guard in the narrow seas; he married Joan, daughter of Thomas Percy, seventh earl of Northumberland [q. v.], but died without issue (Papers relating to the Defeat of the Spanish Armada, ed. Laughton, passim); (4) Edward (1548-1574), so named probably because Edward VI stood godfather (Lit. Rem. p. 61), died 1574 (COLLINS; cf. Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1547-1581, p. 238). By his second wife, Somerset also had six daughters: (1) Anne, who married first, on 8 June 1551, John Dudley, commonly called Earl of Warwick, eldest son of the Duke of Northumberland, and, secondly, Sir Edward Unton, and died in February 1587-8 (cf. A Sermon preached at Farington in Barkeshire the Seventene Days of February 1587 at the buriall of Anne, Countess of Warwicke, widow of Sir Edward Vmpton, London, 1591, 8vo); (2) Margaret, died unmarried; (3) Jane (1541-1601), whom Somerset was accused of plotting to marry to Edward VI, became maid of honour to Queen Elizabeth, died unmarried, and was buried on 26 March 1601 (MACHYN, pp. 254, 384; ELLIS, Orig. Letters, 2nd ser. ii. 273). These three ladies won some literary repute by composing, on the death of Margaret of Valois, some verses published as 'Annæ, Margaritæ, Janæ, Sororum Virginum, heroidum Anglarum in mortem Margaritæ Valesiæ Navarrorum Reginæ Hecadistichon,' Paris, 1550, 8vo; a French translation appeared in the following year; (4) Mary, married first Andrew Rogers of Bryanstone, Dorset, and secondly, Sir Henry Peyton; (5) Catherine, died unmarried; (6) Elizabeth, who married Sir Richard Knightley of Fawsley, Northamptonshire.

By an act of parliament passed in 1540, Somerset's estates were entailed upon his issue by his second wife in preference to his issue by his first, and similar clauses were introduced into the patents for his subsequent dignities and grants of land. By act of parliament 5 Edw. VI the duke's dignities were declared forfeited, but his son was created Earl of Hertford in 1559, and his great-grandson William [q. v.] was 'restored' to the dukedom of Somerset in 1680 by the repeal of the said act. The younger line died out with Algernon, the seventh duke [see under SEYMOUR, CHARLES, sixth DUKE OF SOMERSET], in 1750, and the dukedom then reverted, according to the original patent, to the Seymours of Berry Pomeroy, Devonshire, the elder line, in which it still remains. According to 'Third Report of the Lords' Committee on the Dignity of a Peer' (p. 40), the representative of the elder line would have become Duke of Somerset on the failure of the younger, without the 'restoration' of the second duke in 1600, on the ground that the attainder could not touch the right vested in the elder line by the patent (cf. NICOLAS, Peerage, ed. Courthope, pref. p. lxxvii).

[There is no biography of Somerset except a worthless brochure published in 1713 comparing him with the Duke of Marlborough. The present writer's England under the Protector Somerset, 1660, narrates his political achievements. The materials for his biography are extensive. Most of Somerset's public correspondence is in the Record Office, but a portion on Scottish affairs is among the Addit. MSS. in the British Museum, especially Nos. 5758, 6237, 25114, 32091, 32647, 32648, 32654, 32657 (these papers, originally deposited among the archives of the council of the north, were subsequently moved to Hamilton Palace, Scotland; in 1883 they were acquired by the German government, but repurchased by the British Museum six years later; they have been calendared as the Hamilton Papers, 2 vols. 1890-1892). Many papers, relating principally to his genealogy and family history, are among the Harleian and Cottonian MSS. in the same library. Much information respecting his private affairs is to be found among the Lisle Papers in the Record Office, and the manuscripts preserved at Longleat, their presence there being due to the fact that Sir John Thynne, ancestor of the marquises of Bath, managed Somerset's estates during his protectorate. Many of his letters have been printed at length in the State Papers of Henry VIII (11 vols. 1890-52), and these, with others down to 1540, have been calendared in Brewer and Gairdner's Letters and Papers of Henry VIII (15 vols.); the manuscripts at Longleat were used by Canon Jackson in his paper on the Seymours of Wolf Hall in Wiltshire Archæol. Mag. vol. xv. Other scattered letters have been printed in Ellis's Original Letters. See also Sadleir's State Papers, Haynes's Burghley Papers, and the Calendars of Domestic, Foreign, Venetian, and Spanish State Papers (in the index to the last of which he is consistently confused with his brother the admiral); Hist. MSS. Comm. 1st, 2nd, 4th, 5th, and 7th Rep. passim. Other contemporary authorities are the Lords' Journals; Acts of the Privy Council (ed. Nicolas vol. vii. and ed. Daines vol. i.-iv.); Rymer's Fœdera; Wriothlesley's Chron., Machyn's Diary, Grey-frs Chron., Narratives of the Reformation, Troubles connected with the Prayer Book, Chron. of Calais, Services of Lord Grey de Wilton (all these published by Camden Soc.); Lit. Remains of Edward VI (Roxburghe Club); Teulet's Papiers d'Etat and John Knox's Works (Bannatyne Club); The Complaynt of Scotland (Early Engl. Text Soc.); The Late Expedition into Scotland, 1544, 8vo; Patten's Expedition into Scotland, 1548, 4to; Letters of Cardinal Pole; Zurich Letters (Parker Soc.); Mémoires of Du Bellay (Panthéon Littéraire); Mémoires de Vieilleville, ed. 1822; Correspondances de Marillac, ed. Knulek; Corresp. Politique de Odet de Selve, ed. 1818; Spanish Chron. of Henry VIII, ed. M.A.S. Hume, 1888; Wood's Letters of Royal and Illustrious Ladies; Somerset's Works in Brit. Mus. Libr. See also Hall's, Grafton's, Fabyan's, Baker's, and Holinshed's Chronicles; Stowe's and Camden's Annals; Speed's Historie; Hayward's Life and Raigne of Edward the Sixth; Herbert's Life and Reign of Henry VIII; Leland's Commentaries; Strype's Works, passim; Wood's Athenæ Oxon.; Lloyd's State Worthies; Foxe's Actes and Mon. and Book of Martyrs; Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation, ed. Pocock; Fuller's Church Hist. ed. Brewer, and Worthies of England; Myles Davies's Athenæ Brit. vol. ii.; Walpole's Royal and Noble Authors, Nott's Works of Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey; Cobbett's State Trials, Lodge's Illustrations; Maitland's Essays on the Reformation; Tytler's, Lingard's, and Frodo's Histories; Spelman's Hist. of Sacrilege; Cooper's Athenæ Cantabr.; Dixon's Hist. of the Church of England; Gasquet and Bishop's Edward VI and the Common Prayer; Friedmann's Anne Boleyn; Bapst's Deux Gentilshommes Poètes; Hoare's Modern Wiltshire; Collinson's Somersetshire; Lipscomb's Buckinghamshire; Colline's, Courthope's, and G. E. C.'s Peerages; Gen. Mag. 1845, i. 371, 487; Archæologia, i. 10-12, v. 233, xviii. 170, xxx. 463-89; Genealogist, new ser. vol. xii.; Church Quarterly Rev. Oct. 1892; English Hist. Rev. Oct. 1886, and July 1895.]

A. F. P.

SEYMOUR, SIR EDWARD, EARL OF HERTFORD (1530?-1621), was the eldest (surviving) son of Edward Seymour, first duke of Somerset [q.v.], the Protector, by his second wife, Anne. He is always said to have been the son who, born on 12 Oct. 1537, the same day as Edward VI, was styled Lord Beauchamp, and had as his godparents Queen Jane Seymour, the Princess Mary, and Cromwell (Lisle Papers, vol. xii. arts. 36, 75). But it seems more probable that this child died in infancy, and that the Earl of Hertford was the Edward who was born on 25 May 1539, and had as godfathers the Dukes of Suffolk and Norfolk (GARDNER, Letters and Papers, xiv. i. 1026, 1033); for Thomas Norton (1532-1584) [q.v.], tutor to Somerset's sons, writing to Calvin on 12 Nov. 1562, states that the duke's son and heir was then thirteen years of age (Lit. Rem. of Edw. VI, p. lxi), and the inscription on his tomb in Salisbury Cathedral says he was in his eighty-third year at his death in 1621 (Descr. of Salisbury Cathedral, 1774, pp. 70-71). He was educated with Prince Edward, and was knighted at his coronation on 20 Feb. 1546-7, being styled Earl of Hertford between 1547 and 1552. On 7 April 1550 he was sent as a hostage to France, returning three weeks later. His father's attainder for felony, December 1551, did not affect his dignities or estates, and on his execution on 21 Jan. 1551-2 the Earl of Hertford became de jure Duke of Somerset. Being a minor, he could not take his seat in the House of Lords, and in the following April his father's enemies in wanton malice procured an act of parliament (5 Edward VI) 'for the limitation of the late Duke of Somerset's lands,' wherein a clause was introduced declaring forfeit all the lands, estates, dignities, and titles of the late duke and his heirs by his second wife (Cobbett, State Trials, i. 526-7). A few of his father's estates were restored to Seymour by letters patent of Edward VI, but he seems to have been partly dependent for support on Sir John Thynne. He was restored in blood by an act passed in the first session of Mary's reign, and she is said to have desired to make him Earl of Hertford, but was dissuaded by her ministers.

Two months after Elizabeth's accession he was granted the lands which his father had inherited, and created Baron Beauchamp and Earl of Hertford (13 Jan. 1558-9). In November or December 1560 he secretly married Lady Catherine Grey [see SEYMOUR, CATHERINE]. In June he went to Paris with Thomas Cecil (afterwards Marquis of Exeter) [q.v.], whose dissipations were unjustly attributed to his influence. He returned late in August on hearing that his marriage was known and that his wife had been sent to the Tower, and on 5 Sept. joined her there. On the birth of his second son, Thomas, in the Tower, 10 Feb. 1562-3, he was summoned before the Star-chamber and fined 15,000*l.* This extortionate sum has been the ground of much invective against Elizabeth, but the queen immediately remitted 10,000*l.* Of the rest, she demanded that 1,000*l.* should be found immediately, and the earl finally escaped with the payment of 1,187*l.* (Wilts Arch. Mag. xv. 153). On the outbreak of the plague he was removed from the Tower in August 1563, and placed under custody of his mother and her second husband, Francis Newdigate, at Hanworth. But owing to John Hale's published assertion of his wife's claim to the royal succession [see HALES, JOHN, d. 1571, and SEYMOUR, CATHERINE] he was, on 26 May 1564, committed to the custody of Sir John Mason [q. v.]. The death of his wife on 27 Jan. 1567-8 relieved Hertford to some extent of the royal displeasure; he was released late in the same year, but was kept in easy confinement in various country houses until 1571 (Wilts Arch. Mag. xv. 158; but cf. Notes and Queries, 6th ser. vii. 422-3).

Warned by experience, Hertford henceforth lived as quietly as possible. On 30 Aug. 1571 he was created M.A. of Cambridge, and on 2 Feb. 1571-2 was admitted a member of Gray's Inn. In 1578 he was placed on the commission for the peace in Wiltshire, and in the following year was joint commissioner for musters in the same shire. But he again incurred Elizabeth's wrath in November 1595 by renewing the petition to have the declaration of the invalidity of his marriage set aside, and was once more committed to the Tower (cf. Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1595, p. 121; ib. Addenda, 1580-1625, pp. 408-8). He was released on 3 Jan. following. On 29 May 1602 he was made lord lieutenant of Somerset and Wiltshire, and in June 1603 custos rotulorum of the latter shire. On 19 April 1605 he was sent as ambassador-extraordinary to Brussels. On 28 June 1608 he was reappointed lord-lieutenant of Somerset and Wiltshire, and from June 1612 to March 1619 was high steward of the revenues to Queen Anne. In January 1620-1 he attended parliament (D'EWEES, Autobiogr. p. 170). He died on 6 April 1621, and was buried with his first wife in Salisbury Cathedral, where a magnificent monument was erected to his memory. A portrait engraved from it is given in Doyle's 'Official Baronage.' In person Hertford appears to have been diminutive.

By his first wife, Lady Catherine Grey, Hertford had, besides a daughter Catherine, who died an infant, two sons, Edward (see below) and Thomas. The latter, who was born in the Tower and baptised on 11 Feb. 1562-3, married Isabel (d. 1619), daughter of Edward Onley of Catesby, Northamptonshire, and, dying without issue on 8 Aug. 1600, was buried in St. Margaret's, Westminster (WALCOTT, St. Margaret's, p. 29). The report of Scaramelli, the Venetian ambassador, that he was secretly engaged to Arabella Stuart in March 1603 must be incorrect (cf. Edinb. Rev. October 1896). The earl married secondly, before 1582 (Wilts Arch. Mag. xv. 200-1), Frances, daughter of William, lord Howard of Effingham, who died without issue on 14 May 1598 (CHAMBERLAIN, Letters, p. 10); and thirdly, in December 1600, Frances, daughter of Thomas, viscount Howard of Bindon, and widow of Henry Prannell (ib. pp. 100, 112), by whom he had no issue. For performing the marriage ceremony in the third case clandestinely without banns or license, and not in the parish church, Thomas Montfort was suspended by Whitgift for three years (STRYPE, Whitgift, ii. 383, 458). His widow married, after Hertford's death, Ludovick Stewart, second earl of Lennox [q. v.], and died without issue on 8 Oct. 1639, being buried on the 28th in Westminster Abbey.

The eldest son, EDWARD SEYMOUR, LORD BEAUCHAMP (1561-1612), was born in the Tower on 24 Sept. 1561 (the exact date, in Hertford's writing, is given in a bible used by the earl in the Tower, and now at Longleat). He owes his importance to inheriting the Suffolk claim to the royal succession [see SEYMOUR, CATHERINE]. On 22 Dec. 1576 he matriculated from Magdalen College, Oxford, but did not graduate. In June 1582 he married, without his father's consent, Honora, daughter of Sir Richard Rogers of Bryanstone, Dorset. He was, as a matter of course, visited with Elizabeth's displeasure, and confined within his father's house, whence he petitioned Walsingham to be released (Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1581-90, pp. 61, 70). Repeated appeals on his behalf were also brought before William Aubrey [q. v.], master of requests, to set aside the declaration of the invalidity of his mother's marriage. Though these appeals were without result, he was always styled Lord Beauchamp, a title to which he had no right unless he were of legitimate birth (cf. ib. 1591-4, p. 121). In 1596 he and his brother Thomas were implicated with Sir John Smith (d. 1600?) [q. v.] in some treasonable proceedings in Essex; but, beyond a severe examination, no proceedings were taken against him. The insanity with which father and son were treated was attributed to the existence of a considerable party in favour of his claims to the succession, including, it was said, Cecil, Raleigh, Lord Howard of Effingham, and others (ib. Addenda, 1580-1625, pp. 406-8). According to Lady Southwell, Beauchamp's name was suggested as successor to Elizabeth on her deathbed, and she replied, 'I will have no rascal's son in my seat, but one worthy to be a king' (cf. Cornhill Mag. March 1897). Apart from the doubt of his legitimacy, he was by act of parliament rightful heir to the throne for a year after James I's accession, until that monarch's title was settled by statute; but he was generally considered unfit to be a king, and no voice was raised in his favour. The appeal for a decision in favour of his legitimacy was again considered soon after James's accession (see Sir Julius Caesar's report of proceedings in Cotton MS. Caligula, C. xvi. f. 412, which is mutilated), but apparently without success; and on 14 May 1608 Beauchamp obtained a patent in which Hertford was not mentioned as his father, to the effect that he and his heirs should become earls of Hertford and barons of parliament immediately on Hertford's death. Beauchamp, however, predeceased his father in July 1612, being buried at Wick on the 21st, and afterwards removed to a tomb in Salisbury Cathedral (Epitaphs, p. 37). He had three sons: (1) Edward (1587-1618), who matriculated from Magdalen College, Oxford, on 16 April 1605, graduated B.A. 9 Dec. 1607, married on 1 June 1609 Anne, third daughter of Robert Sackville, second earl of Dorset [q. v.], was made K.B. 8 Nov. 1616, but predeceased his grandfather without issue, and was buried on 15 Sept. 1618; (2) William, afterwards second duke of Somerset [q. v.]; and (3) Francis, baron Seymour of Trowbridge [q. v.]

[Wilts Archaeol. Mag. xv. 160 sq. prints various letters of Hertford and his first wife; Ellis's Original Letters, 2nd ser. vol. ii. passim; Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1547-1623; Cal. Hatfield MSS.; Lords' Journals; Lit. Remains Edward VI (Roxburghe Club); Machyn's Diary and Chamberlain's Letters (Camden Soc.); Camden's Elizabeth; Naunton's Fragmenta Regalia; Mrs. Murray Smith's Arabella Stuart, 1889; Collins's and G. E. C.'s Peerages; Bloxam's Reg. Magdalen Coll., Oxford; Hallam's Const. Hist.; Froude's Hist.]

A. F. P.

SEYMOUR, SIR EDWARD (1638-1708), speaker of the House of Commons, born in 1638, was eldest son of Sir Edward Seymour (1610-1685), third baronet, who was great-grandson of Sir Edward Seymour (1529-1598), second son of the Protector [see SEYMOUR, EDWARD, first DUKE OF SOMERSET]. Henry Seymour (1612-1686) [q. v.] was his uncle. The father's house of Berry Pomeroy, near Totnes, was plundered by the roundheads at the outset of the civil war; he sat in the king's parliament at Oxford in 1648, compounded with the parliament at Westminster for 1,200*l.*, and was discharged on 23 Oct. 1649. He recovered most of his local influence at the Restoration, and represented Totnes in parliament from 1660 until his death in December 1685. He left by his wife Anne, daughter of Sir John Portman, first baronet of Orchard-Portman, and aunt of Sir William Portman (1641?-1690) [q. v.], Edward, the speaker; John, who obtained a commission in 1678, served in Flanders as captain in the first foot-guards in 1694, and rose to be lieutenant-colonel; Hugh, a captain in the navy, 'killed in the Dutch wars'; William, who became a gentleman of the bed-chamber to Prince George of Denmark; and Henry, who inherited the Portman estates.

Edward, who entered the House of Commons as member for Gloucester in 1661, was soon known as an apt speaker, and signalised himself by bringing into the house the impeachment of the Earl of Clarendon on 1 Nov. 1667. Seymour's court influence had already obtained for him the post of commissioner of prizes in the navy, and in this capacity he had in 1665 met Pepys, who found him 'very high,' 'proud and saucy.' He was soon afterwards appointed treasurer of the navy with a salary of 3,000*l.* a year. In the meantime, on 18 Feb. 1672-3, upon the serious indisposition of Sir Job Charlton [q. v.], the House of Commons, upon the nomination of Sir William Coventry [q. v.], unanimously elected Seymour as speaker. During the ensuing summer the king created him a privy councillor, an elevation which elicited much unfavourable comment upon the part of independent members. On 27 Oct. 1678 Sir Thomas Littleton gave expression to this feeling. 'You are too big,' he said to the speaker, 'for that chair and for us, and you that are one of the governors of the world, to be our servant, is incongruous.' Clarges maintained the same view, with the rider that no speaker should be permitted to go to court without leave. Seymour declined to vacate the chair while his own behaviour was being debated, and at the close of the debate, which turned in his favour, 'complimented the house to the effect that he held no employment a greater honour to him than that which he had in their service' (Parl. Hist. iv. 593). He was still suspected of partisanship with the court when on 4 Nov. the commons hurried him into the chair that he might put to the vote the motions that the French alliance and the evil counsellors about the king were a grievance. Black Rod 'knocked earnestly' at the door before the question could be put, and some spoke of holding the speaker in his chair, but he leapt out 'very nimbly,' says Reresby, and the house rose in confusion. Subsequently by his courage and an assumption of dignity, which frequently amounted to arrogance, he gained the respect of the house. No one probably ever understood the constitution or the mood of the house better than he, and—at a period before parties were so organised as to determine votes—it was said that by merely looking about him he could tell the fate of any question under discussion. On 4 June 1676 he earned much applause by causing Serjeant Pemberton to be arrested in Westminster Hall for lack of respect and for an alleged breach of privilege [see PARNERTON, SIR FRANCIS]. On another occasion, it is related that when at Charing Cross his carriage broke down, the beadies, by his orders, stopped the next gentleman's coach they met, and Seymour drove away in it, merely explaining to the ejected owner that it was fitter for him to walk in the streets than the speaker of the House of Commons. In the new parliament of March 1678-9 Seymour was returned for Devonshire, and was again unanimously elected speaker; but he was now somewhat estranged from the court, especially from Danby, and was no longer acceptable to the king. On submitting himself to the chancellor for the royal approval, he was informed that the king 'thought fit to reserve Seymour for other service, and to ease him of this.' Sacheverell and Powle strongly opposed the power of the crown to reject the choice of the commons. To allay the excitement, the king on 13 March prorogued the house for two days, at the end of which a compromise was effected and Serjeant Gregory appointed (cf. Hist. MSS. Comm. 12th Rep. app. vii. 157).

Upon becoming once more a private member, Seymour seems for a time to have co-operated with Halifax, and shared his unpopularity. Thus he opposed the Exclusion Bill, and at the same time urged the Duke of York to change his religion. In November 1680 articles of impeachment were exhibited against him for malversation in his office, but the dissolution put an end to the proceedings (cf. Add. MS. 9291, f. 1). Later, in March 1681, he seems to have originated a proposal that the crown should descend to James, but that the Prince of Orange should act as his regent. In 1682 he joined with Halifax in trying to bring about Monmouth's restoration to favour. He was, however, drawing nearer to Rochester, through whose influence he hoped, in 1683, to obtain the privy seal, but the prize fell to Halifax. Seymour nevertheless remained at court, generally acting with Rochester's party. His fears for the protestant religion seem to have been genuine, and at the opening of James II's parliament, in which he represented Exeter, he stood almost alone in overt opposition. He spoke of the abrogation of charters and the arbitrary proceedings at recent elections in terms of unguarded candour, with which few dared to sympathise, so numerous and threatening were the nominees of the court. In the same session, in relation to James's force at Hounslow, he raised his voice against standing armies, consisting, as he said, of people whom nobody knew and no one could trust. During the same year (1685) Seymour succeeded to the baronetcy on his father's death.

Surpassed by none as a staunch tory and churchman, he warmly sympathised with the revolution in its earlier phases. In November 1688 he joined William at Exeter, along with Sir William Portman. 'You,' said the prince to him, 'are of the Duke of Somerset's family?' 'Pardon me, sir,' said Sir Edward, who never forgot that he was head of the elder branch of the Seymours, 'the Duke of Somerset is of my family.' While at Exeter he suggested and framed the association in favour of the Prince of Orange, the members of which pledged themselves to hold together until religion and the laws and liberties of the country had been established in a free parliament. This action gained him the confidence of William, who, when he proceeded to Axminster on 25 Nov., left Exeter in Sir Edward's charge. As a parliamentary expert and author of the association, he was well qualified for the office of speaker, when the convention met in January 1689, but he had ranged himself with Rochester in opposing an offer of the crown to William, and Powle was elected.

Early in February he proposed that the house should discuss the state of the nation as a grand committee, and he urged that before the throne was filled liberties must be secured. He was against limiting the duration of parliaments to three years. In the hope of an accession of strength to his party upon a fresh election, he strenuously, but in vain, opposed the motion for turning the convention into a parliament. Great satisfaction was felt at court when Seymour took the oath to the new sovereigns on 2 March, while the Jacobites were proportionately depressed. In November 1689, with unseemly alacrity, he headed a disputation praying William to issue a proclamation for the apprehension of Edmund Ludlow. Seymour had enjoyed Ludlow's forfeited estates in Wiltshire since the Restoration, and he lost no time in hounding the former owner out of the kingdom (Ludlow, Memoirs, 1894, ii. 511). In March 1691-2 he was made a lord of the treasury; but the appointment led to considerable strife owing to Seymour's refusal to give precedence to Richard Hampden, the chancellor of the exchequer, until he was mollified by a seat in the cabinet and a special recommendation to the queen. He lost his place on the formation of the whig junto in April 1694, and henceforth took an increasingly active part in the obstructive tactics of the tories. During the same year there seems no reason to doubt that he was heavily bribed by the old East India Company to oppose the rival establishment, though the transactions were skilfully cloaked, and he escaped any open censure in the house. Shortly afterwards he lost his seat at Exeter, and had to take refuge in the small borough of Totnes. In 1697 he tendered 10,000*l.* for recoinage, and advised, when parliament met, that supply should be postponed to a discussion of the king's speech. In November 1697 he spoke in defence of Sir John Fenwick, citing ancient history and quoting much Latin, but little to the purpose (cf. OLDMIXON, iii. 153, 159). Next year, upon being again returned for Exeter, he was for reducing the civil list to the earlier amount of 800,000*l.* He was prominent in the attacks upon Somers and the Dutch favourites, and was the chief manager of the Resumption Bill for the commons during the early months of 1700. When parliament was prorogued on 11 April, he went to Kensington to take leave of the king. William told him that he did not mean to think of the past, he only hoped they would be better friends next session; to which Seymour, in a tone of conscious superiority and anticipating a tory reaction in the constituencies, replied, 'I doubt it not' (Bonnet's Despatch, ap. RANKE, v. 214).

When the new parliament met in December 1701, Seymour was discovered to be infected by the prevailing enthusiasm for William and the Dutch alliance, owing to Louis XIV's recognition of the Pretender, and he was carried away by the popular fervour for war. Both parties at the new year (1702) were vying with each other in their endeavour to put the king in the best possible position for opening a campaign. The succession of Anne seemed to improve Seymour's prospects. He was in April made comptroller of the royal household, and in May ranger of Windsor Forest. Inopportune as were his strictures upon military abuses, Marlborough and Godolphin tolerated him in the council for two years; but in April 1704 he was abruptly dismissed. His political rancour was well illustrated next year, when upon the eve of Blenheim he vowed that Marlborough should be hunted like a hare upon his return to England. The succession of whig triumphs completely extinguished his influence. He died at his seat of Maiden Bradley on 17 Feb. 1708, and was buried in the parish church. If we may credit Rapin, his death was precipitated by the fright he received at the hands of an old beldame, who assaulted him in his study while the household were absent at a neighbouring fair (Hist. 1761, iv. 65-6).

According to Burnet, Seymour was the ablest man of his party, a man of great birth, graceful, bold, and quick, of a pride so peculiar to himself that, says he, 'I never saw anything like it.' He certainly did not yield in arrogance to his cousin, 'the proud duke' of Somerset. In friendship he was grudging and insincere, and he cannot be acquitted of sordid meanness. He represented a class rather than a party, but he was loyal to certain narrow conceptions of patriotic duty. Resenting his suspicions of the whig hero, Macaulay drew a very harsh portrait of Seymour; but it can hardly be denied that the cause of parliamentary control benefited by his shrewdness and tenacity.

Seymour married, first, on 7 Dec. 1661, Margaret, daughter of Sir William Wals, kt., of London, and by her had Sir Edward, fifth baronet, and father of Edward, eighth duke of Somerset [see under SEYMOUR, CHARLES, sixth DUKE]; and Sir William, who entered the army, was captured by a French privateer in 1692, obtained Outts's regiment, which he commanded with distinction at Namur, was wounded at Landen in July 1693, and died a lieutenant-general in 1723 (D'AUVERGNE, Campaigns in Flanders, 1693, pp. 90-1). He married, secondly, Letitia (d. 1729), daughter of Francis Popham of Littlecote, by whom he had six sons and one daughter. Of these the eldest, Popham Seymour-Conway, succeeded to the estates (worth 7,000*l.* a year) of his mother's cousin, Edward Conway, earl of Conway. He was just becoming known as the most extravagant young lord about town when he was mortally wounded in a duel by an officer named Captain Kirke. He forgave his adversary on his deathbed on 18 June 1699; but his father, Sir Edward, prosecuted Kirke with the greatest vehemence, and when Kirke was convicted of manslaughter he tried without success to obtain a writ of appeal. Popham's fortune passed to his next brother, Francis (1679-1782), who assumed the name and arms of Conway, and was created Baron Conway in March 1703; he was father of Francis Seymour Conway, marquiss of Hertford [q.v.], and of Field-marshal Henry Seymour Conway [q.v.].

A portrait of Seymour, by Roth, was engraved by Worthington, and there is an engraving by Harding from the monument at Maiden Bradley.

[Manning's Lives of the Speakers; G. E. C.'s Complete Peerage, s.v. 'Somerset'; Luttrell's Brief Hist. Relation, vols. iii. iv. v.; Reresby's Diary; Evelyn's Diary; Bulstrode Papers, 1 Nov. 1687; Burnet's Own Times; Eachard's Hist. of England; Christie's Life of Shaftesbury; Boyar's Annals of Anne, 1735, pp. 14, 36, 38, 125, 209; Macanlay's Hist. of England; Ranke's Hist. of England; Wyon's Hist. of Queen Anne, i. 301; Coxe's Life of Marlborough, ii. 307; Cook's Hist. of Parties; Townsend's Hist. of the House of Commons; Mrs. Pilkington's Memoirs, i. 7-11; Dalton's English Army Lists; Hist. MSS. Comm. 7th Rep. App. p. 301, 12th Rep. app. vii. passim.] T. S.

SEYMOUR, EDWARD ADOLPHUS, eleventh DUKE OF SOMERSET (1775-1855), born on 24 Feb. 1775 at Monckton Farley in Wiltshire, was the third but eldest surviving son of Webb Seymour, tenth duke, by his wife Anna Maria, daughter and heir of John Bonnell of Stanton-Harcourt in Oxfordshire. His grandfather, Edward (1695-1757), who came of the elder branch of the Seymour family, succeeded as eighth Duke of Somerset on the failure of the younger line in 1750 [see SEYMOUR, EDWARD, first DUKE OF SOMERSET]. Edward was educated at Eton and matriculated at Christ Church, Oxford, on 31 Jan. 1792. He succeeded to the peerage on the death of his father on 15 Dec. 1793. He was created M.A. at Oxford on 2 July 1794, and received the honorary degree of D.C.L. on 8 July 1810. From an early age he devoted himself to science and mathematics, displaying genuine aptitude for both studies. He was equally well versed in historical and antiquarian knowledge, and Patrick Fraser Tytler [q. v.] the historian valued his judgment in these matters highly. In 1797 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, in 1816 a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, and in 1820 a fellow of the Linnean Society. He was also a member of the Royal Asiatic Society. He took an interest in the Royal Institution, of which he was president for some years, and from 1801 to 1838 he was president of the Royal Literary Fund. From 1826 to 1831 he was vice-president of the Zoological Society, and in 1834 he was chosen president of the Linnean Society, and held the office till 1837. He was bearer of the orb at the coronation of William IV in 1831 and of Victoria in 1838. On 19 April 1837 he was elected a knight of the Garter. He was esteemed an excellent landlord, and, unlike most large landowners, supported the repeal of the corn laws. In the period of agricultural depression which followed he showed his confidence in the measure by making large purchases of land. He died in London at Somerset House, Park Lane, on 15 Aug. 1855, and was buried at Kensal Green cemetery.

He was twice married: first, to Charlotte, second daughter of Archibald, ninth duke of Hamilton; she died on 10 June 1837, leaving three surviving sons and four daughters.

The sons, Edward Adolphus Seymour, twelfth duke [q. v.], Archibald Henry Algonon, and Algernon Percy Banks (father of the present duke), all succeeded in turn to the title. The second wife of the eleventh duke of Somerset was Margaret, eldest daughter of Sir Michael Shaw-Stewart of Blackhall, Renfrewshire. She died at Somerset House on 18 July 1880.

The duke was the author of: 1. 'The Elementary Properties of the Ellipse deduced from the Properties of the Circle,' London, 1842, 8vo. 2. 'Alternate Circles and their Connexion with the Ellipse,' London, 1850, 12mo.

[Times, 16 Aug. 1855, 1st ed.; Gent. Mag. 1855, ii. 425; Michell's Tour of the Duke of Somerset through parts of England, Wales, and Scotland in 1795, published 1845; Foster's Alumni Oxon., 1715-1886; G. E. O.'s Peerage; Foster's Peerage.] E. I. O.

SEYMOUR, EDWARD ADOLPHUS, twelfth DUKE OF SOMERSET (1804-1885), statesman and author, born on 20 Dec. 1804, was eldest son of Edward Adolphus Seymour, eleventh duke of Somerset [q. v.], by his first wife, and was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, matriculating on 11 Oct. 1823, but leaving the university without a degree. He then travelled abroad, visiting Russia among other countries. He married, on 10 June 1830, Jane Georgiana, the youngest of the three beautiful daughters of Thomas, only son of Richard Brinsley Sheridan [q. v.], by his marriage with Miss Linley. Her two elder sisters married respectively Price Blackwood, fourth baron Dufferin, and the Hon. G. O. Norton [see NORTON, CAROLINE ELIZABETH SARAH]. Lord Seymour, as he was commonly called, fought a duel in 1835 with Sir Colquhoun Grant, who challenged him because he would not deny having been privy to the elopement of Sir Colquhoun's only daughter and heiress with his wife's brother, R. B. Sheridan. After shots had been exchanged without injury to either combatant, Seymour avowed his ignorance of the transaction. His wife had helped her brother to obtain the hand of the heiress, and she did so without informing her husband. In August 1839 his wife presided as 'Queen of Beauty' over the tournament at Eglinton Castle [see MONTGOMERIE, ARCHIBALD WILLIAM, thirteenth EARL OF EGLINTON].

Seymour entered the House of Commons as member for Okehampton in 1830, and for twenty-one years, from 1834 to 1855, was member for Totnes. He was a consistent liberal. In 1835 he was appointed a lord of the treasury in Melbourne's administration. In 1839 he was promoted to be secretary to the board of control, and in 1840 he carried through the house a bill which received the royal assent, for establishing a board of superintendence for railways. He was under-secretary for the home department during two months in 1841. He voted for the repeal of the corn laws. Lord John Russell appointed him first commissioner of works in 1851, with a seat in the cabinet, but he was out of office for several years following the resignation of Lord John Russell in 1852. During the campaign in the Crimea he served on a committee of the house to inquire into the state of the army. When the borough of Totnes was disfranchised in 1855 he ceased to be a member of the House of Commons, but took his seat in the House of Lords, as Duke of Somerset, on his father's death on 15 Aug. in the same year.

When Palmerston formed an administration in 1859, the Duke of Somerset was appointed first lord of the admiralty, an office which he filled till 1866. Although not very popular, he was an efficient administrator. He was created K.G. on 21 May 1862, and Earl St. Maur of Berry Pomeroy on 17 June 1863. After his retirement in 1866 he took an active part, out of office, in supporting most of the liberal measures which came before the house, including the bill for the abolition of purchase in the army. He gave an intermittent support to the other measures of Mr. Gladstone's administration of 1868-74, which he declined to join. Subsequently his liberalism grew lukewarm.

In his younger days he sought recreation in yachting cruises in the Mediterranean. His later life was embittered by the loss of his two sons, after which he sought consolation in a study of the historical aspects of Christianity. In 1872 he published a small book on 'Christian Theology and Modern Scepticism.' Another by him, on 'Monarchy and Democracy,' appeared in 1880. He died at Stover Park, Torquay, on 28 Nov. 1885. His wife had predeceased him on 14 Dec. 1884.

His elder son, Edward Adolphus Ferdinand, Earl St. Maur, died on 30 Sept. 1809, and his younger son, Edward Percy, who was in the diplomatic service, on 20 Dec. 1866. Both were unmarried. The dukedom therefore devolved successively on the twelfth duke's two younger brothers, Archibald Henry Algernon, thirteenth duke (1810-1891), and Algernon Percy Banks, fourteenth duke (1813-1894).

[Ann. Register for 1885; Letters, Remains, and Memorials of E. A. Seymour, twelfth Duke of Somerset, K.G., ed. W. H. Mallock and Lady Guendolen Ramsden, 1892; Spencer Walpole's Life of Earl Russell, ii. 423.] F. R.

SEYMOUR, EDWARD JAMES (1796-1866), physician and medical writer, was the third son of William Seymour of 65 Margaret Street, Cavendish Square, London, by his wife, Thyphens Lethbridge, eldest daughter of Daniel Foulston of London. His father, a member of a family settled in Lincolnshire in the middle of the seventeenth century, was an attorney-at-law, who resided at Brighton for thirty years, and was a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant for the county of Sussex, and chairman of the quarter sessions. The son, born on 30 March 1796, was baptised at the church of St. Nicholas, Lower Tooting. He received his education at Richmond School, Surrey, and at Jesus College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in January 1816, M.A. in 1819, and M.D. in 1826. He had a license 'ad practicandum' from his university in 1822. He also studied medicine in London, Edinburgh, and Paris; he was admitted an acceptor candidate of the College of Physicians on 22 Dec. 1823, a candidate on 30 Sept. 1826, and a fellow on 1 Oct. 1827. At the college he subsequently held the posts of Goulstonian lecturer in 1829, censor in 1830, Croonian lecturer in 1831, and consiliarius in 1836.

As the law at that time did not permit physicians to practise in London under the age of twenty-six, the first years of his professional life were passed in Italy, and chiefly at Florence, where he made a large income and formed a connection that was of advantage to him in after life. In 1828 he returned to England, and, establishing himself at 23 George Street, Hanover Square, soon acquired a good practice. On 28 Nov. 1828 he was elected physician to St. George's Hospital; he held the post till 1847, and rose to be senior physician. He was remarkable for his facility in communicating knowledge to the students at the bedside. Soon after settling in London he became physician to the Dreadnought hospitalship at Greenwich, and subsequently consulting physician to the Seamen's Hospital. He was also physician to H.R.H. the Duke of Sussex. From 1 Sept. 1831 to 1839 he was a metropolitan commissioner in lunacy; he latterly devoted much of his attention to insane cases, and was one of the first to use opium freely in the treatment of mental diseases. In 1859 he published a letter, which he addressed to the Earl of Shaftesbury, 'On the Laws which regulate Private Lunatic Asylums, with a comparative View of the process "de lunatico inquirendo" in England and the law of France.' To it are added a few observations on the causes of insanity and on the improvement in the treatment of mental diseases during the preceding twenty-five years. On 17 June 1841 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society; he was also a fellow of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society, and a member of the Royal Medical and Wernerian Society of Edinburgh, and of the Imperial and Royal Academy of Science of Siena.

Seymour died at his residence, 18 Charles Street, Berkeley Square, on 16 April 1866, from organic disease of the stomach and liver. There is a slightly coloured lithograph of him, executed by Slater, about 1830, and a bust in wax, by Foley, which was to have been reproduced in marble. Both portrait and bust are in the possession of the Rev. Edward Seymour at Bratton Clovelly parsonage. On 4 Sept. 1817 he married Maria Searancke of Clapton, and by her had a family of six sons and four daughters. The eldest son, Lieutenant-colonel Charles Frederick Seymour, C.B., of the 84th regiment, was acting adjutant-general at the siege of Lucknow.

Seymour was an accomplished man outside the range of his professional practice. His works possess considerable literary merit. The chief are: 1. 'Diseases of the Ovaria' (with a volume of plates), 1830. 2. 'Observations on the Medical Treatment of Insanity,' 1832. 3. 'Nature and Treatment of Dropsy,' 1837. 4. 'Thoughts on the Treatment of several severe Diseases of the Human Body,' 1847. He also published: 'On Tumours in the Abdomen' ('Trans. Med. Chir. Soc.,' vol. xiii.); 'On some of the Diseases of the Stomach' ('Med. Gaz.,' vol. i.); and a series of papers 'On the specific Effect of Atmospheric Poison in the Production of Fever' ('Med. Gaz.,' vols. iii.-iv.)

[Proceedings of Med. Chirurgical Soc. 1867, v. 251; Munk's Coll. of Phys.; Churchill's Directory, Lancet, 1866; Medical Times and Gazette, 1866, information supplied by his son, the Rev. Edward Seymour, rector of Bratton Clovelly, Devonshire.] W. W. W.

SEYMOUR, FRANÇOIS, first BARON SEYMOUR OF TROWBRIDGE (1690?-1664), born about 1690, was the third son of Edward Seymour, lord Beauchamp (1561-1613), by his wife Honora, daughter of Sir Richard Rogers of Brynstone, Dorset. Edward Seymour, earl of Hertford [q. v.], was his grandfather. William Seymour, second duke of Somerset [q. v.], was his eldest brother. Francis was knighted by James I at Royston on 23 Oct. 1613. In June 1611 he was accused of abetting the escape of his brother William and Arabella Stuart, but protested his innocence (Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1611-1618, p. 39). On 26 Dec. 1620 he entered parliament as member for Wiltshire. In the following May he distinguished himself by the severity of the penalties he proposed to inflict on Edward Floyd [q. v.]. During the session of 1624 he made strenuous efforts to bring about a war with Spain, but protested against any extensive military operations on the continent, and opposed the despatch of an army to the Palatinate on the ground of the 'extreme charge' (GARDINER, v. 342, 345; SEELEY, British Policy, i. 336). On 10 May 1625 he was again returned for Wiltshire, and on 30 July following proposed to limit the grant to one subsidy and one-fifteenth, about a tenth of what Charles required to meet his engagements. Buckingham made overtures to him which were rejected, and in July Seymour refused to join in the attack on Lord-keeper Williams because it was secretly abetted by the duke. In August he attacked the government for engaging in a continental war, inveighing against speculation in high places and the sale of offices at court; on these grounds he dissuaded the house from granting supplies. He was re-elected to the new parliament summoned in February 1625-6, but was made sheriff of Wiltshire to prevent his sitting. In the following July his name was struck off the commission of the peace.

Thenceforth Seymour adhered to Wentworth's policy of moderation. In March 1627-8 he was elected to parliament as member both for Wiltshire and Marlborough. On 29 April he joined Noy and Digges in their attempt to modify the commons' bill of liberties, and supported Wentworth's Habeas Corpus Bill. He also advocated with Wentworth against Eliot a joint-committee of the two houses on the petition of right. The proposal made by the lords was rejected by the commons. In May 1639 he refused to pay ship-money, and in the following March was elected without opposition member for Wiltshire to the Short parliament. He was re-elected for the same constituency to the Long parliament. In April 1640 he spoke against ecclesiastical grievances, and in November he again attacked the government. But he soon began to differ from the popular party, and on 19 Feb. 1640-1 he was created Baron Seymour of Trowbridge, Wiltshire. He insisted on voting against Strafford's attainder in the lords, though the opposite party denied his competence to vote on the ground that he was not a peer when the charges against Strafford were first brought up. In June 1642 he signed the declaration that the king had no intention of war, followed him to York, and offered to raise twenty horse in his cause; parliament accordingly declared him a delinquent. In the following autumn he accompanied his brother, the Marquis of Hertford, into the west to organise the royalist forces and suppress the parliamentary militia, and in September he crossed from Minehead to Glamorganshire on a similar errand. In December 1643 he signed the letter of the peers to the council in Scotland, protesting against the invitation sent by parliament to the Scots to invade England. Early in 1645 he was on the commission for the defence and government of Oxford and the adjacent counties; in February he was one of the commissioners appointed to treat at Uxbridge, and in May he was made chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. He was at Oxford when it surrendered on 22 June. He was admitted to composition, and his fine was fixed at 3,725*l*. He attended a council at Hampton Court on 7 Oct. 1647, but took no part in politics during the Commonwealth and Protectorate. At the Restoration he was reappointed chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. He died on 12 July 1664, and was buried in the chancel of Bedwyn Magna church (AUBREY, Top. Coll. Wilts., p. 378). His house at Marlborough, where Aubrey visited him at Christmas 1648 (cf. EVELYN, Diary, ed. Bray, i. 289), was used as an inn until 1843, when it became Marlborough College.

Seymour married, first, Frances, eldest daughter and coheir of Sir Gilbert Prynne (d. 1628) of Chippenham; by her he had issue Charles, second Baron Seymour of Trowbridge (d. 1605), whose son Francis in 1675 succeeded his cousin as fifth duke of Somerset [see SEYMOUR, CHARLES, sixth DUKE OF SOMERSET]. He married, secondly, Catherine, daughter of Sir Robert Lee, by whom he had no issue.

[Seymour's Correspondence and Family Papers are extant in Addit. MS. 32324; a tract by him on usury is in Egerton MS. 71. See also Addit. MSS. 6411 f. 30, 20315 f. 17; Cal. State Papers, Dom. passim; Cal. Clarendon State Papers, ed. Macray; Journals of the Lords and Commons; Off. Ret. Members of Parliament; Stafford Papers, i. 264; Metcalfe's Book of Knights; Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion; Gardiner's Hist. and Civil War; Forster's Eliot; Notes and Queries, 2nd ser. vi. 500, vii. 28.]

A. F. P.

SEYMOUR, FRANCIS (INGRAM), second MARQUIS OF HERTFORD (1743-1822), born in London on 12 Feb. 1743, was eldest son of Francis Seymour Conway, first marquis of Hertford [q. v.] by Isabella, youngest daughter of Charles Fitzroy, second duke of Grafton. After being educated at Eton he matriculated from Christ Church, Oxford, 2 Feb. 1760, and was created M.A. 15 June 1762. As Viscount Beauchamp he represented Lisburne in the Irish House of Commons, 1761-8. In 1765 he was made a privy councillor for Ireland, and for one year, 1765-6, was chief secretary to the lord-lieutenant of Ireland; on resigning that post he was appointed constable of Dublin Castle (Grenville Papers, iii. 325).

In 1766 he entered the English House of Commons, sitting from 1766 to 1768 as member for Lostwithiel, and for Oxford from 1768 to 1794. He was a lord of the treasury in Lord North's administration from 11 March 1774 to 31 Jan. 1780, and was appointed cofferer of the household 1 Feb. 1780, and a privy councillor for Great Britain, 2 Feb. 1780. From 1774 to 1788 he was a frequent speaker in the House of Commons, speaking whenever he addressed the House, 'if not with eloquence, at least with knowledge of the subject' (WRAXALL, Memoirs, iv. 137). He opposed in April 1774 the motion for the repeal of the American tea duty, declaring himself by no means prepared to cede the mother country's right of taxing colonies (Parl. Hist. xviii. 1271), and in December 1777 he moved the previous question on Wilkes's motion to repeal the American Declaratory Act. But although a member of Lord North's administrations, his political sympathies were largely with Fox. In May 1778 he declared himself strongly in favour of the repeal of the penal acts affecting Roman Catholics in Ireland (ib. xix. 1141), and throughout his parliamentary career showed himself in favour of religious toleration (ib. xxvi. 828). He introduced an act for the relief of debtors with respect to the imprisonment of their persons in February 1780, when he was highly complimented by Burke, who supported the bill (ib. xx. 1399). On Fox's motion for the repeal of the Irish Declaratory Act (6 Geo. I), on 16 April 1782, he declared that the simple repeal would not satisfy Ireland unless a counter declaratory clause of Irish parliamentary independence was inserted in the repealing act (Parl. Hist. xxiii. 81; Life of the Rt. Hon. Henry Flood, p. 165; LECKY, Hist. Eighteenth Cent. vi. 105). These views he emphasised in a pamphlet, 'A Letter to the First Company of Belfast Volunteers,' published in Dublin, 1782. On 4 Feb. 1784 the House of Lords resolved 'that an attempt in any one branch of the legislature to suspend the execution of law by assuming to itself the direction of discretionary power is unconstitutional.' Beauchamp proposed, a few days later, six counter resolutions, which he carried against the ministers by a majority of thirty-one (Parl. Hist. xxiv. 548). When the subject of commercial union between England and Ireland was before the house in May 1785, Beauchamp unsuccessfully opposed Pitt's fourth proposition, which bound Ireland to adopt such regulations as Great Britain should enact (ib. xxv. 738), and expressed himself as opposed to any idea of compulsion of the Irish parliament, his opinion being that 'the only lasting connection between the two countries can be of freedom and common interest, not of power' (Letter to the First Company of Belfast Volunteers). Although a warm advocate of the independence of the Irish parliament, he regarded the interests of the two countries as inseparable and their political connection as indissoluble (Parl. Hist. xx. 1202).

After 1788 Beauchamp ceased to take so prominent a part in the House of Commons, but in 1793 he gave strong support to Pitt in the matter of the alien bill, and during the debate on the king's message asking for the augmentation of the forces (ib. xxx. 197, 291). On his father being created Marquis of Hertford in 1793 he took the title of Earl of Yarmouth, and was employed as ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to Berlin and Vienna, 1793-4. He succeeded to the peerage as second Marquis of Hertford on his father's death, 23 June 1794, but in the debates of the House of Lords on political matters he took no part.

Hertford was appointed master of the horse 11 July 1804, holding that office till 12 Feb. 1806. He was invested knight of the Garter 18 July 1807, and appointed lord chamberlain of the household 7 March 1812, and held that office till 11 Dec. 1821. In February 1822 he was created vice-admiral of Suffolk. He died, 17 June 1822, at Hertford House, Manchester Square, and was buried in the family vault at Ragley in Warwickshire. He married, in February 1768, Alicia Elizabeth, second daughter and coheir of Herbert, first viscount Windsor; she died on 11 Feb. 1772, aged 22. He married, secondly, 20 May 1776, Isabella Anne Ingram Shepherd, daughter and coheir of Charles, ninth and last viscount Irvine (d. 1778), by his wife Frances Gibson (born Shepherd). Upon the death of the latter, on 20 Nov. 1807, leaving a 'very large fortune,' Hertford and his wife took the name of Ingram before that of Seymour. The Marchioness of Hertford, who survived her husband until 12 April 1836, was a lady of great wealth and possessed of great personal charms; for many years she exercised considerable influence over the regent (WRAXALL, Memoire, iv. 188).

The only son (by the second marriage) was FRANCIS CHARLES SEYMOUR-CONWAY, third MARQUIS OF HERTFORD (1777-1842). Born 11 March 1777, he graduated B.A. from St. Mary Hall, Oxford, 1796, and represented the family boroughs of Orford, Lisburne, and Camelford (1819-1822). He had great influence with the regent, of whose household he was vice-chamberlain, and was created K.G. on 22 Nov. 1822, shortly after succeeding to the peerage. He was in 1827 envoy extraordinary (bearing the order of the Garter) to Nicholas I of Russia, from whom he had in 1821 received the order of St. Anne; but he is best remembered as the original of the Marquis of Steyne in Thackeray's 'Vanity Fair' and Lord Monmouth in Disraeli's 'Coningsby.' He married, 18 May 1798, the great heiress Maria Fagniani [see under SELWYN, GEORGE], and died at Dorchester House, Park Lane, on 1 March 1842. His portrait, by Sir Thomas Lawrence, was engraved for Doyle's 'Official Baronage' (cf. Croker's Corresp.; G. E. C.'s Complete Peerage). He was succeeded as fourth marquis by his son Richard Seymour Conway (1800-1870), known from 1822 until his father's death as Earl of Yarmouth. Like his brother, Lord Henry Seymour [q. v.], he led an epicurean existence in Paris, rarely, if ever, visiting England, and amassing a splendid collection of pictures and articles of vertu, which he left, along with his Irish estates, to Sir Richard Wallace [q. v.] Upon the fourth marquis's death, on 25 Aug. 1870, the peerage passed to Francis George Hugh, son of Sir George Francis Seymour [q. v.]

[Collins's Peerage of Engl. ed. Brydges, ii. 566; Doyle's Official Baronage; Gent. Mag. 1822, i. 561; Wraxall's Memoirs, ed. 1884, iii. 137.]
W. C. R.

SEYMOUR, SIR FRANCIS (1813-1890), general, eldest son of Henry Augustus Seymour, by Margaret, daughter of the Rev. William Williams of Cromlech, co. Anglesey, was born on 2 Aug. 1813, and was commissioned as ensign in the 19th foot on 2 May 1834. He became lieutenant 16 June 1837. In February 1839, at the request of the king of the Belgians, he joined Prince Albert of Saxe-Coburg at Florence, and accompanied him during his travels in Italy. In 1840, after Prince Albert's marriage with the queen, he was appointed groom-in-waiting to him, and retained the office till the prince's death.

He was promoted captain on 4 Sept. 1840, and on 21 Jan. 1842 he exchanged into the Scots fusilier guards, in which regiment he obtained a company on 28 June 1850. He went with the first battalion to the Crimea in 1854, and was present at Alma, Balaclava, and Inkerman. In the course of the latter battle the command of the battalion devolved on him, and he was himself wounded. He was again severely wounded in the latter part of the siege by a fragment of a shell, which struck the back of his head, when he was field officer in command in the trenches of the right attack. He was made brevet-colonel on 28 Nov. 1854, and C.B. on 2 Jan. 1857. He received the Crimean medal with four clasps, and the Turkish medal, the Legion of Honour (fourth class) and Medjidie (fourth class).

He was promoted major in his regiment on 14 June 1858, and lieutenant-colonel on 13 Feb. 1863; he went on half pay on 10 July 1863, and on 25 Nov. 1864 became major-general. He held the command of the troops in Malta from 1 Jan. 1872 to 5 April 1874. He was made lieutenant-general 23 May 1873, colonel of the Devonshire regiment (11th) 7 Feb. 1874, K.C.B. 29 May 1875, and general 1 Oct. 1877. On 1 July 1881 he was placed on the retired list.

After the death of the prince consort, in December 1861, he was appointed groom-in-waiting to the queen. In 1869 he was made a baronet, and in February 1876 he became master of ceremonies and an extra groom-in-waiting. He was a knight grand cross of the Saxe-Ernestine order.

Seymour died at Kensington palace on 10 July 1890. He married, in 1869, Agnes Austin, eldest daughter of the Rev. H. D. Wickham, rector of Horsington, Somerset, by whom he had one son and three daughters.

[Times, 12 July 1890, Annual Reg. 1890; Early Years of the Prince Consort; Kinglake's Invasion of the Crimea.] E. M. L.

SEYMOUR, FREDERICK BEAUCHAMP PAGET, LORD ALCESTER (1821-1895), admiral, son of Colonel Sir Horace Beauchamp Seymour, grandson of Lord Hugh Seymour [q. v.] and nephew of Sir George Francis Seymour [q. v.], was born in London on 12 April 1821. He received his early education at Eton, and entered the navy in January 1834. He passed his examination in 1840; served as a mate in the Britannia, flagship of Sir John Acworth Ommanney [q. v.] in the Mediterranean, and was promoted to the rank of lieutenant on 7 March 1842. He was then appointed to the Thalia frigate, with Captain George Hope, in the Pacific; and from 1844 to 1847 was flag-lieutenant to his uncle, Sir George Seymour, then commander-in-chief in the Pacific. On 5 June 1847 he was promoted to be commander. In 1852 he served as a volunteer on the staff of General Godwin in Burma, and was four times gazetted for distinguished conduct. In May 1853 he commissioned the Brisk for the North American and West Indian station, whence he was recalled early in 1854 and sent to the White Sea in the squadron under Commodore (afterwards Admiral) Sir Erasmus Ommanney. In May 1855 he was appointed to the Meteor floating battery, which he took out to the Crimea, and brought back to Portsmouth in the early summer of 1856—two feats of seamanship scarcely less dangerous than any war services. In July 1857 he commissioned the Pelorus, which he commanded for nearly six years on the Australian station, where in 1860-1 he commanded the naval brigade in New Zealand during the Maori war; in acknowledgment of this service he was made a C.B. on 18 July 1861.

From 1868 to 1870 he was private secretary to the first lord of the admiralty, Hugh Culling Eardley Childers. On 1 April 1870 he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral. From December 1870 to May 1872 he commanded the flying squadron, and in 1872-4 was one of the lords of the admiralty. From 1874 to 1877 he commanded the Channel fleet; was made a vice-admiral on 31 Dec. 1876, and a K.O.B. on 2 June 1877. From 1880 to 1883 he was commander-in-chief in the Mediterranean; having thus, in 1880, the command of the European squadron of demonstration on the Albanian coast consequent on the refusal of Turkey to cede Dulcigno to Montenegro. On the dispersal of the fleet after the Porte had yielded the point, Seymour received the thanks of the government and was made a G.O.B., 24 May 1881. In the following year he commanded in the bombardment of Alexandria (11 July 1882), and afterwards in the operations on the coast of Egypt. For this service he was raised to the peerage as Baron Alcester of Alcester in the county of Warwick, and received a parliamentary grant of 25,000*l.*, the freedom of the city of London, and a sword of honour. From March 1883 to June 1885 he was again a lord of the admiralty; and on 12 April 1886, having attained the age of sixty-five, was placed on the retired list. During the following years he lived principally in London, where his genial nature rendered him a favourite in society, while his attention to his dress and personal appearance obtained for him the name of 'The Ocean Swell.' Latterly his eyesight failed and his health was much broken. He died at his chambers in Ryder Street, St. James's, on 80 March 1896, and was buried at Brookwood on 8 April. He was unmarried, and at his death the title became extinct.

[Times, April 1895; Army and Navy Gazette, 6 April 1895.] J. K. L.

SEYMOUR, SIR GEORGE FRANCIS (1787-1870), admiral of the fleet, eldest son of Vice-admiral Lord Hugh Seymour [q. v.], was born on 17 Sept. 1787. He entered the navy in October 1797 on board the Princess Augusta yacht, with Captain Edward Riou, and from March 1798 to September 1801 was with his father in the Sanspareil and the Prince of Wales in the Channel and the West Indies. In 1802-3 he was in the Endymion, mostly on the home station, with Captain John Larmour, and afterwards with the Hon. Charles Paget [q. v.] Towards the end of 1803 he was sent out to the Victory, flagship of Lord Nelson in the Mediterranean, and in February 1804 was sent to the Madras as acting lieutenant. A few weeks afterwards he was moved into the Donegal with Sir Richard John Strachan [q. v.], who, early in 1805, was succeeded by Pulteney Malcolm [q. v.] On 12 Oct. 1804 Seymour was confirmed as a lieutenant, and, continuing in the Donegal, took part in the chase of the allied fleet to the West Indies and back, and in the capture of the Spanish ship El Rayo immediately after the battle of Trafalgar. Early in 1806 he joined the Northumberland, flagship of Sir Alexander Forrester Inglis Cochrane [q. v.], in the West Indies, and on 6 Feb. took part in the battle of St. Domingo, where he was severely wounded in the jaw by a grape shot. He had already been promoted to the rank of commander on 22 Jan. 1806, and on 9 Feb. was appointed to the Kingfisher sloop, in which, on 14 May, he was in company with Lord Cochrane in the Pallas, and was able to rescue him from a dangerous position in the entrance of the Basque roads [see COCHRANE, THOMAS, tenth EARL OF DUNDONALD]. On 29 July 1806 he was posted to the command of the Aurora in the Mediterranean, from which, in February 1808, he was moved to the Pallas on the home station. In April 1809 she was attached to the fleet with Lord Gambier off the Basque roads, and on the 12th Seymour made a gallant effort to support Cochrane in his attempt to destroy the French ships. Afterwards, at the court-martial on Lord Gambier, he gave evidence strongly in favour of Cochrane's assertion—that the whole might have been destroyed (DUNDONALD, Autobiography of a Seaman, i. 392, ii. 54-5).

In September 1809 Seymour was appointed to the 36-gun frigate Manilla, which was lost off the Texel in January 1812 during his temporary absence. In June 1812 he was appointed to the Fortunée, and from January 1813 to September 1814 he commanded the Leonidas in the West Indies. On 4 June 1815 he was nominated a C.B., and on 28 May 1816 was awarded a pension of 250*l.* for his wound received in the battle of St. Domingo. From 1818 to 1841 he was sergeant-at-arms to the House of Lords. In 1827 he commanded the Briton for a few months on particular service. He was naval aide-de-camp to William IV from August to November 1830, and from that time till the king's death was master of the robes. In 1831 he was made a K.C.H., and G.O.H. on 9 Dec. 1834. He was promoted to be rear-admiral on 23 Nov. 1841. From September 1841 to May 1844 he was one of the lords of the admiralty; and from 1844 to 1848 was commander-in-chief in the Pacific, where 'the tact, ability, and decision' he showed during the strained relations with France in respect of 'the Pritchard affair' [see PRITCHARD, GEORGE], and the negotiations with the United States about the fisheries, were formally recognised by the government.

On 27 March 1850 he was made a vice-admiral, and on 7 April 1852 a K.C.B. From January 1851 to November 1853 he was commander-in-chief on the North America and West Indies station; and from January 1856 to March 1859 commander-in-chief at Portsmouth. On 14 May 1857 he was promoted to the rank of admiral, was nominated a G.C.B. on 18 May 1860, rear-admiral of the United Kingdom in April 1863, vice-admiral in September 1865, and admiral of the fleet on 30 Nov. 1866. He died of bronchitis on 20 Jan. 1870. He married, in 1811, Georgiana Mary, daughter of Sir George Cranfield Berkeley [q. v.], and had issue four daughters and three sons, the eldest of whom, Francis George Hugh (1812-1884), in August 1870 succeeded his second cousin as fifth marquis of Hertford [see under SEYMOUR, FRANCIS (INGRAM)]. He was appointed groom of the robes in 1833, was lord-chamberlain 1874-1879, and died at Ragley on 25 Jan. 1884, from injuries caused by a fall from his horse.

[O'Byrne's Naval Biogr. Dict.; Times, 24 Jan. 1870, 26 Jan. 1884; Navy Lists; Forster's Peer- J. K. L.]

SEYMOUR, GEORGE HAMILTON (1797-1880), diplomatist, eldest son of Lord George Seymour (seventh son of Francis Seymour Conway, first earl of Hertford

[q. v.] and Isabella, daughter of the Hon. and Rev. George Hamilton, was born at Harrow in 1797. He was educated at first for the navy, which he soon left, and went to Eton. Thence he proceeded to Merton College, Oxford, where he was a postmaster, and graduated B.A. in 1818 and M.A. in 1823. Previously, on 28 March 1813, he had been appointed gentleman usher in daily waiting at court, and in March 1817 attaché to the legation at The Hague. In December 1819 he returned to London as aprécis-writer to Lord Castlereagh at the foreign office, and on 29 Jan. 1822 became his private secretary. In October 1822 he was attached to the Duke of Wellington's special mission to Verona. On 18 Aug. 1823 he became secretary of legation at Frankfurt, and was transferred on 6 Sept. 1826 to Stuttgart, on 28 Dec. 1827 to Berlin, and on 30 July 1829 to Constantinople.

On 13 Nov. 1830 Seymour was appointed minister resident at Florence, and on 18 Nov. 1836 envoy-extraordinary and minister-plenipotentiary to the Belgian court, where he took part in the negotiations by which the independence of Belgium was finally secured. On 10 Dec. 1846 he was removed to Lisbon in the same capacity, and represented the British government through the greater part of the period of insurrection when the British power supported the Portuguese crown. On 28 April 1851 he was appointed to St. Petersburg, where his diplomacy was put to a severe test in the strained relations which arose between Russia and the western powers on the eastern question. He was in frequent intercourse with the czar, and his attitude at this time received the approval of the government. In February 1854, on the outbreak of the Crimean war, he was recalled. On 11 Oct. 1854 he was pensioned; but on 23 Nov. 1855, having just been made privy councillor, he became envoy-extraordinary to Austria, and again took a prominent part in the conferences on the eastern question at Vienna. He finally retired on pension in April 1858. He had been made G.C.H. on 16 March 1836 and G.C.B. on 28 Jan. 1847. He died on 2 Feb. 1880 at his residence, 10 Grosvenor Crescent, and was buried at Kensal Green.

Seymour married, in 1831, Gertrude Brand, third daughter of Lord Dacre, by whom he had four sons and three daughters.

[Times, 4 Feb. 1880; Foreign Office List, 1880; Burke's Peerage, s.v. 'Hertford; Hertlet's State Papers.] C. A. H.

SEYMOUR, HENRY (1612-1686), groom of the bedchamber to Charles II, born in 1612, was second (not fifth) son of Sir Edward Seymour, second baronet of Berry Pomeroy Devonshire, by his wife Dorothy, daughter of Sir Henry Killigrew of Lothbury, Cornwall (pedigree in Hart. Soc. vi. 256; BURKE's Extinct Baronetage). He was in youth page of honour to Charles I. On the outbreak of the civil war he joined the royalist forces under his kinsman William Seymour, marquis of Hertford [q. v.], and in August 1643 was the bearer of the challenge from him to the Earl of Bedford (CLARENDON, Rebellion, vii. 185). Attaching himself to Prince Charles, he carried the message from him to the earl of Warwick in August 1643 concerning the surrender of the fleet (ib. xi. 69), and the last message which the prince sent to his father Charles I before the latter's execution (LUDLOW, Memoirs, ed. Firth, ii. 286). He was sent by Charles II from Jersey to Ireland in September 1649 (GARDNER, Commonwealth, i. 160, 207). He accompanied Charles to Scotland in 1650, was voted away from the king's person by the Scottish committee, and left at Aberdeen after the defeat at Dunbar (Cal. Clarendon Papers, ii. 69, 77, 87). In 1651 he is described as of Charles's bedchamber at Paris (CLARENDON, ubi supra, xiii. 108), and was frequently despatched by the king to his friends in England (Cal. Clarendon Papers, ii. 297). In January 1654 he collected 1,920*l.* for Charles in England, and received a pass on his return to France from Cromwell. He represented that he was solely engaged in his private affairs. He almost immediately returned to England, and would appear to have been arrested in June 1654. He was not released until the end of May 1657, and then upon hard terms (ib. iii. 303). At the Restoration he was elected M.P. for East Loos, which he represented until 1681 (Return of Members). He is described as of Berry Pomeroy in 1660 and of Westminster in 1661, and is said to have received 40,000*l.* in Duchy leases (MARVELL). He was appointed a groom of the bedchamber, comptroller of the customs, and clerk of the hanaper. In 1666 he resided at Langley, Buckinghamshire, and in 1669 bought that estate from the trustees of Sir William Parsons (BURKE, ubi supra). During the latter part of his life he lived in retirement there, and died on 9 March 1686. He married, first, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Joseph Killigrew, widow of William Basset of Claverton; she died 1671; secondly, Ursula, daughter of Sir Robert Austen of Bexley, Kent, widow of George Stowel, esq., of Ootherston, Kent. By the second wife he had a daughter and a son Henry, who was created a baronet at seven years of age during the life of his father (4 July 1681).

[Authorities as in text; Hoskins's Charles II in the Channel Islands; Ormonde Letters, passim; Calendars of Clarendon MSS. Bodleian, passim; Andrew Marvell's Seasonable Argument.] W. A. S.

SEYMOUR, HENRY (1729-1805), lover of Madame Du Barry, was the son of Francis Seymour, M.P., of Sherborne, Dorset, brother of the eighth Duke of Somerset, by Elizabeth, daughter of Alexander Popham, and widow of Viscount Hinchinbrook. Born in London in 1729, he married in 1768 Lady Caroline Cowper, only daughter of the second Earl Cowper. Besides his father's estate at Sherborne, he inherited an uncle's property at Knoyle, and also owned Northbrook Lodge, Devonshire, and Redland Court, near Bristol. He became a groom of the bedchamber, was returned for Totnes at a by-election in 1768, and sat for Huntingdon 1768-74, and Evesham 1774-80. He spoke on 29 Feb. 1776 in support of Fox's motion for an inquiry into the miscarriages of the American war. A widower in 1778, he married in 1775 Louise Thérèse, widow of Comte Guillaume de Panthou. In 1778 he settled in Paris, obtained letters of domicile to protect his property from forfeiture to the crown as aubain, in the event of death, and purchased a country house at Prunay, between Versailles and St. Germain. He thus became the neighbour, and may have already been the lover, of Madame Du Barry. He preserved about forty of her letters to him, together with a lock of her hair. The letters are undated, but were probably written in 1780, shortly before his separation from his wife. They show that his jealous temper led to a rupture. These relics, apparently left behind him on his hasty departure from France in August 1792, came into the possession of Barrière, an autograph collector, and, after passing through other hands, were sold in Paris in 1892. All Seymour's property was confiscated, and bundles of his tradesman's bills and other papers are now in the Archives Nationales, Paris. He remained in England till his death in 1805, and after Waterloo his heirs obtained compensation for his loss out of the fund for indemnifying British subjects. He published anonymously in 1788 a French prose translation of the 'English Garden,' by William Mason [q.v.], with views of Prunay.

By his first wife he had two daughters: Caroline, who married William Danby [q.v.], the bibliophile and mineralogist; and Georgina, who married Comte Louis de Durtfort. By his second wife he had a son Henry (1776-1849), high sheriff of Dorset in 1836. He had also an illegitimate daughter, who, born in France, became the mother of the Sir Roger Tichborne personated by Arthur Orton in the famous litigation of 1871.

[Manuscripts in the Archives Nationales, Paris; Gougeon's Madame Du Barry; Vatel's Madame du Barry; Douglas's Life and Times of Madame du Barry, pp. 312 et seq.; Alger's Englishmen in the French Revolution.] J. G. A.

SEYMOUR, LORD HENRY (1803-1859), founder of the Jockey Club at Paris, was the younger son of Francis Charles Seymour Conway, third marquis of Hertford, by Maria Fagniani, adopted daughter of George Augustus Selwyn (1719-1791) [q.v.]. His grandfather was Francis (Ingram) Seymour, second marquis of Hertford [q.v.]. Lord Henry was born in Paris on 18 Jan. 1805, his father, then Lord Yarmouth, having been detained in France on landing there just after the rupture of the treaty of Amiens. Lord Yarmouth was released in 1806 through Fox's intercession with Talleyrand, but his wife remained in France, and Lord Henry is said, though this is a manifest exaggeration, never to have set foot in England. In 1856 he inherited his mother's large fortune. In 1833 he was one of the eighteen founders of a society for the encouragement of horse-breeding in France, to which was attached the Jockey Club, and his horses repeatedly won prizes at the Bois de Boulogne and Chantilly races. A prominent member of the aristocratic society of Paris, he was noted for his eccentricities, and in the carnivals of 1834 and 1835 he attempted to introduce the Italian custom of throwing confetti and coins among the crowd. He died in Paris, unmarried, on 16 Aug. 1859, and was buried in his mother's vault at Père-Lachaise. He bequeathed money for the support of four favourite horses, which were never again to be saddled, and left the residuum of his property, about 36,000*l.* a year, to the Paris hospitals.

[Moniteur, 29 Jan. 1834; Times, 25 Aug. 1859; Ann. Reg. 1859; Gent. Mag. 1859, ii. 432; Revue Britannique, August 1878; Alger's Englishmen in the French Revolution.] J. G. A.

SEYMOUR, LORD HUGH (1759-1801), vice-admiral, fifth son of Francis Seymour Conway, first marquis of Hertford [q.v.] of that creation, was born on 29 April 1759. He entered the navy in 1770 under the care of Captain John Leveson-Gower [q.v.], on board the Pearl on the Newfoundland station. Afterwards he served in the West Indies and in the Mediterranean, and was promoted to be lieutenant on 10 Aug. 1776. He was made commander on 18 June 1778, and captain on 8 Feb. 1779. In 1780 he commanded the Ambuscade in the Channel; and in 1782 the Latona, which was attached to the fleet under Howe at the relief of Gibraltar. After the peace, he, with his younger brother, George, and 'Jack' Payne [see PAYNE, JOHN WILLERT], took a house in Conduit Street, where, leading an irregular and convivial life, he was admitted to the intimacy of the Prince of Wales; from this fate he was in great measure rescued by his marriage on 8 April 1785 to the Lady Anne Horatia Waldegrave, daughter of the Duchess of Gloucester by her first marriage to James, second earl Waldegrave [q. v.]. During the Spanish armament of 1780 he commanded the Canada, and while in her received an accidental blow on the head from the lead, as soundings were being taken. He had in consequence to live for a time in retirement in the country. By February 1793 he was able to undertake active service, and was appointed to the Leviathan, in which he accompanied Lord Hood to the Mediterranean. After the occupation of Toulon he was sent home with despatches, but returned at once and resumed command of the Leviathan, which was shortly afterwards sent home to join the fleet under Lord Howe. He had thus a distinguished part in the actions of 28 and 29 May and 1 June 1794. On the death of his father he dropped the name of Conway, by which he had till then been known, and for the future appeared in the list of captains as Seymour.

Early in 1795 he was moved into the Sanspareil, and on his promotion to flag rank, 1 June 1795, he hoisted his flag on board the same ship, in which he took part in the action off Lorient on 23 June. In March 1795 he was appointed one of the lords of the admiralty, and so he continued till 1798, without, however, taking any active share in the work of the board, as he was at sea, with his flag still in the Sanspareil, for almost the whole time. On 14 Feb. 1799 he became a vice-admiral, and during the spring commanded a detached squadron off Brest. In the summer he was appointed commander-in-chief at Jamaica, where, with his flag in the Prince of Wales, he arrived in August. With the exception of the capture of Surinam in the August of 1800, his command was uneventful, and on 11 Sept. 1801 he died, while cruising for his health off Jamaica. His body was sent to England. His portrait by Hoppner, which belonged to his grandson, Frederick Beauchamp Paget Seymour, lord Alcester [q. v.], was engraved. By his wife, the Lady Horatia, he had issue four daughters and three sons, the eldest of whom was Sir George Francis Seymour [q. v.]

[Naval Chronicle, ii. 358, vi. 462; Ralfes' Nav. Biogr. ii. 126; James's Naval History; Lists of Sea Officers; Foster's Peerage, s.n. 'Hartford.' J. K. L.]

SEYMOUR, JAMES (1702-1752), animal-painter, son of James Seymour, a banker and amateur artist, who lived on terms of intimacy with Sir Peter Lely and Sir Christopher Wren and died in 1739, was born in 1702. He gained a great reputation for his hunting subjects and portraits of racehorses, many of which were engraved by Thomas Burford [q. v.] and Richard Houston [q. v.]. He was employed by Charles Seymour, sixth duke of Somerset [q. v.], to decorate a room at Petworth with portraits of his racehorses, and Walpole tells a curious story of his truculent behaviour to the duke when the latter took offence at Seymour claiming relationship to him. Seymour's picture of the famous carriage match against time at Newmarket in 1750, which was at one time in the collection of Sir Joshua Reynolds, now belongs to Colonel Smith-Barry, M.P. The Duke of Grafton owns his 'Mr. Delme's Foxhounds,' and several of his hunting and racing works are in the possession of Sir Walter Gilbey, bart. Seymour's sketches of the horse in its various attitudes show extraordinary power, but he never acquired much skill as a painter, his technique being hard and coarse and his colouring unpleasant. He died on 30 June 1752.

[Walpole's Anecdotes of Painting, ed. Dallaway and Wornum; Sports Exhibition Catalogue (Grosvenor Gallery), 1891; Gent. Mag. 1752, p. 336.] F. M. O'D.

SEYMOUR, JANE (1609?-1537), third queen of Henry VIII. [See JANE.]

SEYMOUR, SIR MICHAEL (1738-1834), rear-admiral, second son of the Rev. John Seymour (d. 1795), one of a younger branch of the family of the dukes of Somerset which settled in Ireland in the time of Elizabeth, was born at the Glebe House, Pallas, co. Limerick, on 8 Nov. 1738. By his mother, Griselda, daughter and coheir of William Hobart of High Mount, co. Cork, he was related to the family of the earls of Buckinghamshire. He entered the navy in November 1780 on board the Merlin sloop with Captain James Luttrell [q. v.], whom he followed in March 1781 to the Portland; in April 1782 to the Mediator, and in April 1783 to the Ganges. When Luttrell retired from the navy in September 1783, Seymour was moved into the Europa, going out to Jamaica with the flag of Vice-admiral James Gambier (1723-1789) [q. v.]. From the Europa he was transferred to the Antelope, and afterwards to the Janus with Captain John Pakenham, and in September 1785 returned to England in the Ariel, in bad health. In June 1786 he joined the Pégase, guardship at Portsmouth; and in June 1787 the Magnificent, with Captain George Cranfield Berkeley [q. v.], an intimate friend of Luttrell's. On Luttrell's death in December 1788, Berkeley brought Seymour's name before the Duchess of Gloucester, but it was not till 29 Oct. 1790 that Seymour was promoted to lieutenant of the Magnificent. In October 1791 the Magnificent was paid off, and the next eighteen months Seymour spent with his family in Ireland. In March 1793 he was appointed to the Marlborough, then commissioned by Berkeley, and was still in her in the battle of 1 June 1794, when he was severely wounded. His arm had to be amputated above the elbow, and Seymour was obliged to go on shore for recovery. In the following February he joined Berkeley in the Formidable, from which he was moved in June to the Commerce de Marseilles, and in August to the Prince. On 11 Aug. 1795 he was promoted to the rank of commander. In June 1796 he was appointed to the Fly, from which in August he was moved to the Spitfire sloop, carrying eighteen 18-pounder carronades and two long six-pounders. In this he was employed for the next four years in the Channel and on the north coast of France, where he made a great number of prizes—privateers and armed vessels, besides small vessels trying to carry on the coasting trade; he is said to have captured eighty-three guns and four hundred seamen brought in as prisoners. On 11 Aug. 1800 he was advanced to post rank.

During the following years he was appointed to the temporary command of a great many different ships, without being able to get a ship of his own. It was not till June 1806 that he was appointed to the 86-gun frigate Amethyst, which was attached to the Channel fleet, but principally employed in independent cruising on the coast of France, with which, during his long service in the Spitfire, Seymour had become well acquainted. On the evening of 10 Nov. 1808, off the Isle Groix, he fell in with the French frigate Thétis which had sailed that afternoon from Lorient with a detachment of troops on board for Martinique. A little after nine he brought her to action, and for three hours one of the most stubborn and well-contested fights of the war was maintained. Crowded as she was with men, the Thétis endeavoured to close with her antagonist and carry her by boarding; but failing to do this, while her men were gathered on deck, she received the Amethyst's broadside of guns loaded to the muzzle with roundshot and grape. The effect was terrible; and a few minutes after midnight, being reduced to a wreck, having 236 killed or wounded out of 436 on board at the beginning of the action, she struck her flag and was taken possession of. The Amethyst's loss of seventy killed or wounded out of 261 testified to the severity of the struggle. Her rigging, too, was cut to pieces, her mizenmast fallen, and her main and fore masts badly wounded. Unfortunately for Seymour, his rockets and the sound of the firing had drawn to the scene of action the 74-gun ship Triumph and the frigate Shannon; and, though they did not come up for almost an hour after the Thétis had been won, they were sufficiently near to share for the capture, and to permit the commanding officer of the Thétis to say that she was taken by a 74-gun ship and two frigates (cf. TROUBE, iii. 619; JAMES, iv. 379; and art. BROKE, SIR PHILIP BOWEN VERN). As soon as the two ships were made safe, the Amethyst returned to Plymouth, accompanied by her prize in tow of the Shannon. Seymour was presented with the gold medal; by the Patriotic Fund, with 100*l.* for a sword or a piece of plate; and by the corporations of Limerick and Cork with the freedom of the cities. The first lieutenant of the Amethyst and one of the midshipmen nominated by Seymour were promoted, and other officers appointed to higher rates.

On 8 Feb. 1809 Seymour, still in the Amethyst, sailed again on a cruise, and in the early morning of 6 April, off Ushant, fell in with, engaged, and captured the French frigate Niemen, which lost 120 men killed and wounded in the action. Again the brilliance of the victory was a little clouded by the arrival of the Arethusa just before the Niemen struck her flag; and though she was clearly beaten before the Arethusa came up, and the captain of the Arethusa disclaimed any part in the action beyond firing a few shots, these few shots had probably the effect of making her surrender a few minutes sooner than she otherwise would have done (cf. TROUBE, iv. 86; JAMES, v. 17; and the article on MANNES, SIR ROBERT). On his return to England Seymour was created a baronet, Lord Mulgrave writing, on 22 April, that the king highly approved of his distinguished gallantry and conduct, and the two brilliant and successful actions which had added these two frigates of superior force to the British navy. During the summer the Amethyst was attached to the fleet on the coast of Holland, part of the time with the flag of Sir Richard John Strachan [q. v.] on board; and in October Seymour was appointed to the Niemen, the officers and crew of the Ame-thyst being at the same time turned over to her. In her he continued on similar service, but without any particular opportunity of distinction, till May 1812, when he was appointed to the 74-gun ship Hannibal, which he commanded in the Channel for the next two years, capturing the French frigate Sultane on 26 March 1814.

In September the Hannibal was paid off, and Seymour settled down for the next few years near Kingsbridge in Devonshire. On 3 Jan. 1815 he was nominated a K.C.B.; and in the following December the pension for the loss of his arm was increased to 300*l.* a year. In September 1818 he was appointed to the Northumberland, guardship at Sheerness; and in August 1819 to the Prince Regent, one of the royal yachts, from which, in 1825, he was moved to the Royal George, the king's own yacht. During this time he lived principally on shore at Blandworth House, which he had bought, within easy distance of Portsmouth. He read much, and occupied himself with gardening. In spite of having only one arm, he was able to dispense with assistance in the ordinary pursuits of life.

In January 1829 he accepted the appointment of commissioner at Portsmouth, which was, by custom, tenable for life; but in 1832 the admiralty abolished the navy board and, with it, the commissionerships at the dockyards. Seymour was offered the choice of holding his office for two years longer and then retiring, or of returning to the active list, taking his flag, and going out to South America as commander-in-chief. This was what he chose to do, his commission as rear-admiral being dated 27 June 1832. With his flag in the Spartiate, he sailed in February 1833 for Rio, where the duties of the station compelled him to remain. In April 1834 he had a severe attack of low fever, and on his partial recovery he was landed for the benefit of his health. On shore, however, he made no satisfactory progress, and died on 9 July 1834. He was buried in the English cemetery at Rio, where there is a monument to his memory. There is also a tablet in the dockyard chapel at Portsmouth. He married, in 1798, Jane, daughter of Captain James Hawker [q. v.] of the royal navy, and had by her a large family. His third son, Michael (1802-1887), is separately noticed. Seymour's portrait, by Northcote, is in the possession of his grandson, Admiral Sir Michael Culme-Seymour.

[The Memoir (privately printed, 8vo, 1878), by his fifth son, the Rev. Richard Seymour, canon of Worcester, is full and accurate, see also Marshall's Roy. Nav. Biogr. iii (vol. ii. pt. i.) 204; Naval Chronicle, xxi. 89 (with portrait); United Service Journal, 1834, pt. iii.; James's Naval Hist. (cr. 8vo edit.); Troude's Batailles navales de la France.] J. K. L.

SEYMOUR, SIR MICHAEL (1802-1887), admiral, third son of Rear-admiral Sir Michael Seymour (1768-1834) [q. v.], was born on 5 Dec. 1802. He entered the navy in December 1818 on board the Hannibal, with his father; but when she was paid off he was sent back to school, and in March 1816 was entered as a scholar at the Royal Naval College at Portsmouth. On passing out from the college he was appointed, in October 1818, to the Rocheport, going out to the Mediterranean with the flag of Sir Thomas Francis Fremantle [q. v.] In her, and afterwards in the Ganymede, with Captain Robert Cavendish Spencer [q. v.], he continued till his promotion to the rank of lieutenant, 12 Sept. 1822. In July 1823 he was appointed to the Sybill, with Captain (afterwards Sir Samuel John Brooke) Pechell [q. v.] and in her was present at the demonstration against Algiers in 1824. On 6 Dec. 1824 he was promoted to be commander, and in August 1825 was appointed to the Chamblon brig in the Channel, from which he was posted on 5 Aug. 1826. In January 1827 he was appointed to the Menai for the South American station, which then included both the east and west coasts of South America and all the eastern Pacific. In September 1827 he was moved into the Volage, in which he returned to England in the spring of 1829. In 1832 his father, on being appointed to the command of the South American station, wished to have him as his flag-captain. This the admiralty refused, but, in accordance with a promise then given, appointed him in June 1833 to the Challenger, in which he joined his father at Rio. He was afterwards sent round to the Peruvian coast, but returned to Rio on the news of his father's death. Later, on his way back to the Pacific, the Challenger, by an abnormal and previously unknown reversal of the current, was wrecked on the coast of Chili, near Leubu, on 19 May 1835. The men were landed, and encamped for about seven weeks on this desolate shore, till assistance could be brought from Concepcion. Seymour returned to England in the Conway frigate, and, being tried by court-martial for the loss of his ship, was acquitted of all blame and highly commended for his conduct subsequent to the wreck. In 1841 he commanded the Britannia as flag-captain to Sir John Acworth Ommanney [q. v.], and from her was moved to the Powerful, which he brought home and paid off early in 1842.

From 1845 to 1848 he commanded the Vindictive as flag-captain to Sir Francis William Austen [q. v.] on the North American and West Indies station. In 1849 he made a prolonged tour in France, visiting the dockyards, arsenals, and engineering works, and after his return wrote a very full and careful report to the admiralty. In December 1850 he was appointed superintendent of Sheerness dockyard, from which, in September 1851, he was transferred to Devonport, with the rank of commodore of the first class. On the imminence of the war with Russia in 1854, he was appointed captain of the fleet ordered to the Baltic under the command of Sir Charles Napier, and held that office during the campaign of that year. On 27 May 1854 he was promoted to be rear-admiral, and the following year was again in the Baltic as second in command, with his flag in the Exmouth, a screw ship of ninety-one guns. While examining one of the 'Jacobies' (i.e. small sea mines), which had been picked up off Cronstadt, it exploded, wounding him in the face, and destroying the sight of one eye.

In the spring of 1856 Seymour went out overland to take command of the China station, and, after having visited Japan, had returned to Hong Kong when, early in October, he received news of the seizure of the British lorcha Arrow by the Chinese authorities at Canton. The governor of Hong Kong, Sir John Bowring [q. v.], put the matter into Seymour's hands with a request that he would bring pressure to bear on the Chinese viceroy. Accordingly Seymour seized the forts which covered the approaches to Canton, and, when the viceroy proved unyielding, occupied the Bogue forte. Troops were sent out from England, and Lord Elgin arrived with full powers to negotiate [see BRUCE, JAMES, eighth EARL OF ELGIN]. But the outbreak of the mutiny in India rendered it necessary to change the destination of the troops, and Lord Elgin followed them to Calcutta. Meantime the Chinese junk fleet was destroyed after a sharp action in the Fathian creek on 1 June 1857; and on the arrival of other troops and the return of Lord Elgin, as the Chinese viceroy still refused all concessions, Seymour pushed up the river, and, after a clever feint, attacked and captured Canton with very little loss on 28-29 Dec. 1857. The viceroy was seized [see KEY, SIR ASTLEY COOPER] and sent, a prisoner, to Calcutta; but as the court of Peking refused to negotiate, Lord Elgin considered it necessary to move the scene of action to the north. In the end of April 1858 Seymour in his flagship, the Calcutta, arrived in the Gulf of Pecheli, and, on the request of Elgin, took the forte at the mouth of the Pei-ho on 20 May, and forced the passage up the river as far as Tientsing, where on 26 June a treaty was signed, in which the Chinese government conceded the demands of the English minister. Seymour afterwards escorted Lord Elgin to Japan, and then returned to Hong Kong, reaching England early in the following summer, on the expiration of his term of three years. The invariable success which attended his operations in the war in China was entirely due to his calm foresight and careful attention to the minutest details. On 20 May 1859 he was nominated a G.C.B., and shortly afterwards was presented by the China merchants with a handsome service of plate. On 9 Aug. 1859 he was returned to parliament for Devonport, resigning his seat in February 1863.

On 1 Nov. 1860 he was promoted to the rank of vice-admiral, and on 5 March 1864 to be admiral. From March 1863 to March 1866 he was commander-in-chief at Portsmouth. In 1870 he was put on the retired list, and in 1875 was nominated to the then honorary office of vice-admiral of the United Kingdom. He died on 23 Feb. 1887. He married, in 1829, his first cousin, Dorothea, daughter of Sir William Knighton [q. v.], and left issue two daughters. A good portrait in crayons, by A. de Salome, was engraved by F. Holl the elder.

[Journals, letter-books, &c., and information from the family; The Wreck of Her Majesty's Ship Challenger, 1836, 8vo; G. W. Cooke's China; Oliphant's Narrative of the Earl of Elgin's Mission to China and Japan; Parliamentary Papers: Correspondence relative to Operations in the Canton River, 1857; Correspondence between Lord Elgin and the Chinese High Commissioner Yeh, 1857-8; Correspondence respecting insults in China, 1857; Papers relating to the proceedings of Her Majesty's Naval Forces at Canton, 1857; Correspondence relative to the Earl of Elgin's Special Mission to China and Japan, 1859; Correspondence respecting the Affairs of China, 1860; Correspondence relating to the Non-arrival of Gunboats off the Peiho at the time required by the Earl of Elgin, 1860; Navy Lists; Personal knowledge.]

J. K. L.

SEYMOUR, MICHAEL HOBART (1800-1874), controversialist, born on 29 Sept. 1800, was sixth son of John Crossley Seymour, vicar of Caherelly (d. 19 May 1831), who married in January 1789 Catherine, eldest daughter and coheirress of Rev. Edward Wight, rector of Meelick in Limerick. He claimed to be the lineal descendant of Sir Henry Seymour, brother of Jane Seymour, wife of Henry VIII. Aaron Crossley Hobart Seymour [q. v.] was his brother. In 1823 he graduated B.A. of Trinity College, Dublin, and proceeded M.A. in 1832. He was admitted ad eundem at Oxford on 2 June 1836, and comitatus causa on 26 Oct. 1836. Seymour was ordained deacon in 1823 and priest in 1824. The first thirty-four years of his life were passed in Ireland in active clerical work. He was also secretary to the Irish Protestant Association. An untiring opponent of the dogmas and practices of the church of Rome, he became very unpopular in Ireland, and about 1834 migrated to England. For several years he was evening lecturer at St. George the Martyr, Southwark, afternoon lecturer at St. Anna's, Blackfriars, and travelling secretary for the Reformation Society. In January 1844 Seymour married, at Walcot church, Bath, Maria, only daughter of General Thomas of the East India Company's service, and widow of Baron Brownmill, physician to Louis XVIII. From that time he resided, when in England, at Bath, and did not hold any preferment in the church.

In September 1844 Seymour and his wife travelled by easy stages to Rome, and he described his visit in two books, 'A Pilgrimage to Rome,' 1846, 4th edit. 1851, and 'Mornings among the Jesuits at Rome; being Notes of Conversations held with certain Jesuits in that City,' 1849 (3rd edit. 1850; 5th edit. 1852). The first book was criticised in 'A brief Review by A. M.,' Bath, 1849, and the second in 'The Rambler,' iv. 144-9 (1849). Seymour had a rhetorical way of marshalling his facts, and his deductions could not always be relied upon. But he followed up his attack in 'Evenings with the Romanists. With an introductory chapter on the Moral Results of the Romish System,' 1854; 2nd edit. 1855. This was issued at New York in 1855, and in the same year was reissued at Philadelphia in a mutilated form. It was also translated into Spanish, and had a large circulation in Mexico. Seymour died at 27 Marlborough Buildings, Bath, on 19 June 1874, leaving no issue, and was buried at Locksbrook cemetery on 25 June. He possessed the fluency of speech and the racy humour of most Irishmen (cf. GRANT, Metropolitan Pulpit, pp. 266-81).

Through life Seymour was unwearied in contributing to newspapers, and in publishing pamphlets and lectures against the church of Rome. A lecture on 'Nunneries,' issued in 1852, involved him in a controversy with Cardinal Wiseman, who published a reply. Seymour brought out in 1838 a new edition, with five appendices, of Foxe's 'Acts and Monuments of the Church.' It purported to be 'carefully revised, corrected, and condensed.'

[Gent. Mag. 1844, i. 310; Foster's Alumni Oxon.; Foster's Baronetage; Men of the Tim. 8th edit.; Todd's Dublin Graduates; Record, 24 June 1874, p. 2; Bath Express, 27 June 1874, p. 8; Keene's Bath Journal, 27 June 1874, p. 4.]
W. P. O.

SEYMOUR, ROBERT, pseudonymous editor of Stow's 'Survey of London.' [See MOTTLEY, JOHN, 1692-1750.]

SEYMOUR, ROBERT (1800?-1836), book-illustrator, born about 1800, was the posthumous son of Henry Seymour, a gentleman of Somerset, who, falling on evil times, moved to London, and obtained employment as a cabinet-maker with an upholsterer named Seddon. Robert's mother, Elizabeth Bishop, was a native of Marston, Somerset. A widow in poor circumstances, with two sons and a daughter, she gave her children such education as she could at home, and in due time apprenticed Robert to Vaughan, a pattern-drawer, of Duke Street, Smithfield. She died in 1827. Seymour, notwithstanding the humorous character of his best known works, inherited from her a very serious cast of mind.

During his boyhood, Seymour's spare time was devoted to sketching and painting. Apart from the mere A B C of pencil and water-colour drawing learned in his trade of pattern-drawing, he was indebted to his own exertions alone for his future proficiency. During his apprenticeship he devoted much of his leisure to miniature-painting, whence he derived a facility in catching likenesses. After the determination of his indentures, he entered on the career of a professional artist. At first he occupied himself chiefly in painting, and in 1822 was rewarded by the acceptance of a picture for exhibition by the Royal Academy at Somerset House. This was his first and last appearance there. He offered another, but it was rejected. He was fortunate enough to be brought early into the society of the artist, Joseph Severn [q. v.], whom he may have met at the house of his uncle, Thomas Holmes [see HOLMES, EDWARD]. There also Robert saw much of his cousin Jane Holmes (b. April 1801), whom he married in 1827.

Although Seymour never wholly abandoned oil-painting, he mainly confined his energies to preparing illustrations for the publishers of books, journals, and caricatures.

Nothing seemed to come amiss to him. He was as much at home with 'Don Juan' as the 'Book of Martyrs,' and passed with the confidence of youth from the illustrations of Demosthenes and Ovid, to Shakespeare, Wordsworth, Gay, and Southey. He thus spent six busy years, during which all his work was drawn on the wood, or at any rate with a view to the graver. He worked with extraordinary rapidity, and at a very low price. Most of his illustrations were remunerated at half a guinea apiece. In 1827 the firm of Knight & Lacey, by whom he had been largely employed, went bankrupt. This, although pecuniarily a disaster, gave Seymour the opportunity he had long desired of dispensing to a great extent with the middleman, the wood-engraver, by whom his work had been terribly mutilated. In self-defence he directed his attention to etching on copper. His earliest attempt was the rare and badly bitten plate, 'Assisting, Resisting, and Desisting.' McLean, the print-seller, now gave him employment. The earliest work done for McLean was signed 'Shortehanka.' This pseudonym was soon dropped in reference to an objection raised by George Cruikshank. He also did much book illustration for the publishers Maddelay and William Kidd, and to this period belonged 'Snatches from Oblivion,' 1827, and the 'Devil's Progress,' 1830; besides a series of illustrations for Richardson's two series of plays, the 'New Royal Acted Drama' and the 'New Minor Drama,' 1827-30.

Although a keen reader from early days (chiefly of religious and philosophic books), his neglected education was always apparent in the defects of his handwriting and spelling. This (together with his rather serious cast of mind) may account for his abstention from the society to which his talents and professional income would have readily admitted him. He was for a long time a keen sportsman. In 1830 his health was seriously affected by overwork, but complete change of air soon brought about his recovery. From 1831 his artistic output was enormous.

Successful though Seymour was with the etching needle, he soon to a great extent, though not completely, abandoned it for the more expeditious method of lithography. His works on stone are numbered by hundreds. The best known are the 'Humorous Sketches,' first published, at 3d. apiece, between 1833 and 1836, and afterwards collected. They have been republished and re-engraved in many forms. Their popularity has, paradoxical though it may sound, gone a long way to damage Seymour's reputation as an artist, for it caused the plates to be printed and reprinted until the impressions were mere smudges. Other successful lithographs included those done for McLean's 'Monthly Sheet of Caricatures, or the Looking-Glass,' from 1830 to 1836, and the twelve illustrations for 'Maxims and Hints for an Angler,' 1833. From 1831 to 1830 his woodcuts were mainly executed for 'Figaro in London.' Of this weekly sheet, Gilbert Abbott & Beckett [q.v.], then a mere youth, was editor. Until 1834 the collaboration continued, during which time all things smug and self-satisfied were mercilessly satirised by their joint pen and pencil. Editor and illustrator then quarrelled. Seymour objected to the careless cutting and printing of his blocks, and to the editorial patronage of his youthful employer. On 16 Aug. the paper appeared unillustrated. A fortnight later Seymour resigned. In a few months the editorship passed into the hands of Henry Mayhew. In January 1835 Seymour again became the illustrator, and so continued until his death. Between 1831 and 1835 were also published, with Seymour's illustrations, Miss Louisa Sheridan's 'Comic Offerings,' Miller's series of the 'Old English Drama,' 'New Readings of Old Authors,' and Hervey's 'Book of Christmas' (1835), in which thirty-six etchings by Seymour proved his best work in that line; these plates were afterwards published separately. During this winter of 1835-6 the publishers, Chapman & Hall, employed Seymour to illustrate a comic publication called 'The Squib Annual.' This led to Seymour's suggesting to Chapman a series of 'Cockney sporting plates,' to be published, with letterpress, in monthly parts. Hall applied to Charles Dickens [q.v.], then an obscure journalist, to write the letterpress. Dickens modified the scheme, and, entitling his work 'The Papers of the Pickwick Club,' quickly became the dominant partner in the undertaking. Seymour could not brook the mere toleration of his designs, and when to this was added something in the nature of dictation from his collaborator (though couched in the kindest terms), his overtaxed nerves magnified the matter until it grew unbearable. The first part of the 'Pickwick Papers' duly appeared and met with a triumphant reception; Seymour, who therein proved beyond all dispute his ability as a graphic humourist, executed the plates for the second part; but before it was published he shot himself with a fowling-piece on 20 April 1836. The often repeated statement that Seymour's suicide was the result of a Beckett's treatment of him is contradicted by chronology. By his wife, who died 4 July 1868, Seymour had two children: Robert, who survives, and Jane (d. 1881).

A few of Seymour's original pencil studies for the Pickwick plates were subsequently sold at Sotheby's for 500*l*. There is a miniature of himself in ivory, the whereabouts of which is not known; it was painted about 1827, and represents him leaning one hand on Paley's 'Moral Philosophy.' An extremely rare lithograph (not a first-rate portrait), published by his widow in 1841, has been reproduced in facsimile.

[Information kindly supplied by Mr. R. Seymour, the memoir of the artist prefixed to Hotten's edition of Sketches by Seymour, 1886, obl. 4to; Everitt's English Caricaturists; Fitzgerald's History of Pickwick; Forster's Life of Dickens]

SEYMOUR, THOMAS, BARON SEYMOUR OF SUDLEY (1608 P-1549), born about 1608, was the fourth son of Sir John Seymour (d. 1596) of Wolf Hall, Wiltshire, by his wife Margery (d. 1551), daughter of Sir Henry Wentworth of Nettlested. Edward Seymour, first duke of Somerset [q. v.], was his elder brother. He must be distinguished from Sir Thomas Seymour who was sheriff of London on 'evil May day' 1516, was lord mayor of London in 1526 and 1530, was mayor of the Staple at Westminster, was employed by Henry VIII on various commercial negotiations, and died on 11 Dec. 1532 (cf. Letters and Papers, vol. iv. passim; Greyfriars Chron. pp. 30, 33; Ellis, Shoreditch, p. 54). The future lord high admiral first came into notice in 1530 as a servant of Sir Francis Bryan [q. v.], who during his frequent embassies employed Seymour to carry despatches (Letters and Papers, v. 323, 325). But the marriage of his sister Jane [see JANE SEYMOUR] to Henry VIII in May 1536, and of another sister, Elizabeth, to Cromwell's son Gregory, opened the way to rapid preferment. On 1 Oct. following he received a grant in survivorship of the stewardship of Chirk and other castles and manors in the Welsh marches, and in the same year he became a gentleman of the privy chamber. In 1537 he was granted the manor of Holt, Cheshire, and on 18 Oct. he was knighted (WRIOTHESLEY, Chron. i. 69). Grants of Coggeshall, Essex, Romsey, Hampshire, and Colshull, Berkshire, followed in the next two years (cf. Addit. MS. 15558, f. 72), and in July 1538 the Duke of Norfolk suggested a marriage between Seymour and his only daughter Mary, widow of the Duke of Richmond. The suggestion failed, owing probably to the vehement opposition of Norfolk's son, the Earl of Surrey, and in 1543, soon after the death of Lord Latimer, Seymour sought the hand of his widow, Catherine Parr [q. v.]; but Catherine was destined to become Henry VIII's sixth wife.

Meanwhile, in 1538, Seymour accompanied Sir Anthony Browne (d. 1548) [q. v.] on his embassy to the French court, and in October was present during the negotiations at Cambray, carrying despatches thence to London on the 21st. On 12 June 1539 a bill, introduced by Cromwell, was passed, securing certain lands to him (Lords' Journals, i. 116 a, 119 a). He was one of those appointed to meet Anne of Cleves at Calais on 13 Dec. 1539 (Chron. of Calais, pp. 168, 173), and was one of the six knights selected to challenge all comers at the tournament on 1 May 1540. A few weeks later he was sent to Ferdinand, king of Hungary and brother of Charles V, to enlist support for Henry against France and Scotland. He arrived at Vienna in July, and remained there two years, describing, in his letters to Henry, the progress of the war against the Turks. He was recalled in October 1542, but was sent in December to Nuremberg to engage two thousand horse and three thousand foot for the English service. Failing in this object, he was recalled in January 1542-3, but in the following May was appointed ambassador, with Dr. Nicholas Wotton [q. v.], to the regent of the Netherlands (State Papers, Henry VIII, vol. ix. passim). War breaking out between England and Spain on the one side, and France on the other, Seymour was on 26 June made marshal of the English army in the Netherlands, being second in command to Sir John Wallop [q. v.] On 24 July 1543, with a strong detachment, he captured and destroyed the castles of Rinqueken and 'Arbrittayne' [Ardingen] (ib. ix. 452). At the beginning of August he was sent to the regent to ask for reinforcements; on his return he held for a short time the chief command during Wallop's illness, and besieged Bolhain; he went into winter quarters at Calais in November (ib. ix. 460-2 et seq.). As a reward for his services he received further grants of land, and on 17 April 1544 was made master of the ordnance for life. In this capacity he served in France during the campaign of the following summer. He returned to England at its close, conveying large stores of ammunition and ordnance. In October he was appointed admiral of the fleet, and on the 29th was directed to revictual Boulogne, and then await the French fleet in mid-Channel. These plans were frustrated by storms.

During the summer of 1545 Seymour was stationed at Dover, with orders to defend the Kentish coast against the projected French invasion. In August apparently he joined the main fleet under Lord Lisle at Portsmouth, but on 17 Sept. was directed to proceed with all haste to the narrow seas. On 15 Oct. the French fleet having finally dispersed, he was directed to bring into the Thames all the English ships, with the exception of a few left to guard the narrow seas. On 29 Nov. he was granted Hampton Place, outside Temple Bar, which he seems to have renamed Seymour Place. In the following year Norfolk again sought to disarm the enmity of the Seymours by pressing for the marriage of the Duchess of Richmond with Sir Thomas, but was once more foiled by Surrey (BÆST, Deux Gentilshommes Poètes, pp. 388-9; Cotton MS. Titus B. i. f. 94). In October 1546 Seymour was named commissioner to arrange terms with France about the frontier of the Boulonnais and the fortifications of Boulogne (Corr. Politique de Odet de Selve, 1546-9, ed. 1888, pp. 47, 181; State Papers, Henry VIII, xi. 319, 346-8, 355). On 23 Jan. 1546-7, five days before Henry's death, Seymour was sworn of the privy council (Acts P. C. ed. Dasent, i. 566).

Henry left him 200*l.* by his will, and, according to Paget, desired that he should be made a peer and lord high admiral. He was accordingly created Baron Seymour of Sudeley in Wiltshire on 16 Feb., and made K.G. and lord high admiral on the following day. He took a prominent part in the tournament at Edward's coronation on 21 Feb., and in the evening entertained the court at his house near Temple Bar. On 4 March he was put on a commission to negotiate a defensive league with France (Corr. Pol. de Odet de Selve, pp. 109, 114). On the following day he was sent to take the seal from the chancellor Wriothesley. There seems to have been some intention of making him governor of the king (Greyfriars' Chron. p. 54; Lit. Remains of Edward VI. p. cxiv), but it was not carried out. Seymour's ambition was not satisfied with his subordination to his brother, the Protector, and he began almost at once to intrigue for a share in his authority. Immediately after Henry's death he sought the hand of the Princess Elizabeth (Wood, Letters of Royal and Illust. Ladies, iii. 191-2), and, according to the French ambassador, De Selve, he also made advances to the Princess Mary and Anne of Cleves (Corr. Pol. pp. 154-5); but being refused, he secretly married the queen dowager, Catherine Parr, two or three months later [see CATHERINE PARR]. When the news leaked out the Protector was 'much offended' (Lit. Rem. Edward VI. p. 215), and there were frequent disputes between the two brothers as to the precedence of their respective wives. Seymour now began to examine precedents by which in cases of a royal minority one uncle had had the protectorate of the realm, and the other the governance of the king's person (cf. HAYNES, State Papers, pp. 74-5); he tampered with the king's attendants, and sought to win Edward's favour by supplying him liberally with pocket money; he endeavoured to stimulate a dislike of the Protector in the king's mind, and urged him to take the government into his own hands. He also tried to persuade Edward to write a letter on his behalf to the parliament, which met on 4 Nov., and he threatened, if parliament refused his demands, to make it 'the blackest parliament that had ever been seen in England.' In the same parliament he seems to have been mainly instrumental in procuring the act which made the duration of the protectorate depend upon the king's pleasure, instead of being fixed until the king should be eighteen years of age. About the same time he formed a project for marrying Edward to Lady Jane Grey, who was then a member of Seymour's household.

Seymour used his position as lord high admiral with the same object. On 5 April 1547 he set out to visit the western ports, and prepare an expedition against one 'Thomassin,' a pirate who had seized on the Scilly Isles and used them as a basis for privateering operations against the trade of all nationalities (Corr. Pol. pp. 180, 189). Notwithstanding his superior force, Seymour left the pirate unmolested, and apparently came to an understanding with him to share the spoils and the control of the islands. He made a similar attempt to occupy Lundy Isle, and, in spite of the protests of the French ambassador and the remonstrances of his brother, he systematically connived at privateering, thereby seeking to win over the pirates to his own ends (OFFENHEIM, Administration of the Navy, 1897, pp. 101-2, 104; Chron. of Henry VIII. ed. Hume, 1889, pp. 161-2). In August he declined the offer of the command of an army which was to be conveyed by sea to Edinburgh to co-operate in the Protector's invasion of Scotland. He remained behind as lieutenant-general of the south, in order to defend the coast of the Isle of Wight against a possible French invasion. In the Protector's absence he endeavoured to ingratiate himself with the landowners whom Somerset had offended. He urged his personal friends like Dorset and Northampton (HAYNES, pp. 78-80) to secure adherents among the young gentlemen and yeomen who had no interest in the maintenance of the existing state of affairs, while he himself sought to gain influence in various counties by acquiring stewardships and manors. He began to store ammunition in Holt Castle, and to boast of having ten thousand men at his command. To provide funds for the maintenance of this force he obtained, through Sir William Sherington or Sherington [q. v.], control of the mint at Bristol.

It was not Seymour, as Maclean states, but Clinton who was sent in command of the fleet against Scotland during the summer and autumn of 1548. Seymour remained at home busy with his intrigues against his brother's authority. In August he was back at Sudeley, where, on 5 Sept., Catherine Parr died in childbirth. Seymour at once renewed his suit for the hand of Elizabeth, whom he had treated with indelicate familiarity during her residence in his house, and who had consequently been removed by Catherine. But his proceedings had become known to the council. Russell and others had repeatedly warned him, and at length the Earl of Rutland brought an accusation against him. After various conferences with the council the Protector summoned Seymour to an interview. He refused to come, and on 17 Jan. 1548-9 the council sent Sir Thomas Smith and Sir John Baker to arrest him at his house near Temple Bar. He was imprisoned in the Tower, whither he was followed on the 18th by his adherents, John Harington [see under HARINGTON, SIR JOHN], Sir William Sherington, Sir Thomas Parry, John Fowler, and Mrs. Ashley, the governess of the Princess Elizabeth. On the 20th the lord privy seal, Southampton, and Petre were deputed to examine him and his confederates. As a result of these examinations (printed in HAYNES, pp. 65-107) thirty-three articles of accusation were drawn up (printed in Acts P. C. 1547-50, pp. 248-56), and on 28 Feb. the whole council, except Somerzet, Cranmer, and Baker, waited on Seymour in the Tower to receive his answer. He refused to reply unless confronted by his accusers in open trial, and on the following day the council reported the result to the king and Protector. A deputation of both houses of parliament failed to obtain from Seymour any answer to the charges other than the first three. The council then unanimously declared that his offences amounted to high treason, and on the 25th framed and introduced into the House of Lords a bill of attainder (printed in Statutes of the Realm, IV. i. 61-5). An act of 1547 had swept away all treasons created since the statute of 1352, and the council's decision has been generally regarded as illegal; but Seymour's dealings with pirates and measures for securing adherents might plausibly be construed as 'levying war upon the king,' and his connivance at Sherington's frauds as 'counterfeiting the king's money,' while his general conduct was undoubtedly a menace to the peace of the realm. The bill passed the House of Lords on 27 Feb. without a division, after the evidence against him had been heard, and the judges had agreed that he was guilty of treason. The commons appear to have made some objection, and the question was fully debated in a house of four hundred members; but the bill passed its third reading on 4 March, with ten or twelve dissentients (Lords' Journals, i. 845 et seq.) Seymour was executed on Tower Hill on the morning of 20 March, and, according to the doubtful authority of Latimer, his last act was to instruct his servant to convey two letters to the Princesses Mary and Elizabeth, urging them to conspire against the Protector. He was buried within the Tower.

Lingard, Maclean, and others have maintained that Seymour's abilities were superior to those of his brother, but the evidence is not conclusive. He was undoubtedly a capable soldier, of great personal prowess and handsome features, and he won the affections of many of those with whom he was brought into contact (cf. Lady Jane Grey to Seymour, printed in MACLEAN, p. 71). But these qualities were marred by unscrupulous ambition, an overbearing disposition, and, according to Latimer, moral profligacy. He was accurately described by Elizabeth as 'a man of much wit and very little judgement.' A letter to him from Roger Ascham is extant in Addit. MS. 38271, f. 86.

His portrait, painted by Holbein, belongs to the Marquis of Bath; a miniature, by Holbein, is at Sudeley, in the possession of Mrs. Dent, who has reproduced it in her Annals of Winchcombe and Sudeley; she also possesses an anonymous portrait of Seymour, and two others, also anonymous, are respectively in the Wallace collection and that of Sir G. D. Olerk, bart. (cf. Cat. Victorian Exhib. Nos. 185, 209, 443, 1077; Cat. First Loan Exhib. No. 181). Seymour's portrait, with some lines, entitled 'The Hospitable Oaks,' written by Harington after Seymour's death, and printed in Nugae Antiquae, p. 390, was presented by Harington to Elizabeth after she became queen (cf. SIR JOHN HARINGTON, Ariosto, 1591, ed. 1684, p. 161).

Seymour's daughter Mary, born on 29 Aug. 1548, was committed to the care of the Duchess of Somerset, and restored in blood by an act passed on 22 Jan. 1549-50 (Lords' Journals, i. 381, 383). According to Miss Strickland, she married Sir Edward Bushe, and was ancestress of the Johnson Lawsons of Grove Villa, Clevedon, who possess some personal relics of her mother, Catherine Parr; but the evidence of Wriothesley's 'Chronicle' and the silence of contemporary records as to her subsequent existence establish almost beyond doubt that she died in infancy.

[Sir John Maclean's Life of Sir Thomas Seymour (privately printed in 1869, and not in the Brit. Museum Library) is written mainly from contemporary sources. See also Addit. MSS. 5751 (ff. 295, 307), 5753 (ff. 20, 48, 137), 6705 (f. 62), 19398 (f. 52), authorities mentioned in the text, and under art. SEYMOUR, EDWARD, first DUKE OF SOMERSET.] A. F. P.

SEYMOUR, WILLIAM, first MARQUIS and second EARL OF HERTFORD and second DUKE OF SOMERSET (1588-1660), born in 1588, was second son of Edward Seymour, lord Beauchamp, by Honora, daughter of Sir Richard Rogers of Bryanston, Dorset [see SEYMOUR, EDWARD, EARL OF HERTFORD, 1539?-1621, and SEYMOUR, CATHERINE]. Lord Beauchamp died in 1619, in the lifetime of his father, the Earl of Hertford, but by reason of the doubt affecting his legitimacy, the title by letters patent of 1608 was entailed upon his eldest son Edward, and in the event of his death and failure of his issue upon the second son, William. William Seymour early showed both taste and aptitude for study, and was sent to Oxford, where he matriculated from Magdalen College on 16 April 1605, graduated B.A. on 9 Dec. 1607, was created M.A. on 31 Aug. 1636, and D. Med. on 12 Aug. 1645. He was chancellor of the university from 1643 to 1647, and again in 1660.

About 1602 Arabella Stuart [see ARABELLA] had formed an attachment for a member of the Seymour family, and probably for William, although he was a boy of only fifteen. Antony Rivers [q.v.], the jesuit, wrote on 9 March 1602-3: 'Some say [Arabella] is married to the Earl of Hertford's grandchild, which is most false' (Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1601-3, p. 299). According to the improbable account of Scaramelli, the Venetian envoy (Edinb. Rev. October 1896), it was one Thomas Seymour who at this period attracted Arabella's favour. This Thomas Seymour has been erroneously identified with William Seymour's uncle, Thomas Seymour, the Earl of Hertford's younger son. The latter died some time before—on 8 Aug. 1600 (cf. DUGDALE, Baronage, and COLLINS, Peerage), and he was survived by a wife who died on 20 Aug. 1619. In any case, the intrigue was frustrated by the rigour of Queen Elizabeth; and Lady Arabella, having relinquished what was designated by Elizabeth's successor as forbidden fruit, was taken into favour by the new king upon his accession in 1603. In 1610, however, though she had now attained the discreet age of thirty-five, Arabella once more infringed the royal prerogative by seeking a husband for herself from 'her own rank.' This time her lover was undoubtedly William Seymour.

While at Oxford William Seymour had opportunities of visiting Arabella at Woodstock, and on 2 Feb. 1609-10 the pair plighted their troth. The secret was ill-kept, and the lovers were summoned before the council. Seymour made submission in writing (20 Feb.) denying the existence of an engagement or intention of marriage without the king's consent. The explanation was accepted, the lovers continued to meet, and on 22 June were privately married at Greenwich. The affair got wind at once, and while Lady Arabella was committed to the custody of Sir Thomas Parry at Lambeth, Seymour was provided with lodgings in the Tower (8 July). Neither was closely confined; Seymour found means to pay occasional visits to Lambeth, and, after Arabella was removed to Barnet, the Countess of Shrewsbury concerted a plan of escape in order to enable her to join him. On 4 June Arabella rode in man's attire some thirteen miles down to the Thames, where she embarked in a French vessel, which promptly sailed for Calais, but was captured by a boat from an English frigate about a league from that port. Arabella was remitted to the Tower. Meanwhile her husband had sailed in quest of her. He effected his escape from the Tower by the help of his barber, one Batten. Batten, who was well known to the guards, presented himself on 3 June at the Tower, completely disguised, and asked for Mr. Seymour's barber, whom he professed to know to be within. On being admitted he transferred the disguise to Seymour, and then boldly sallied forth with him. The unfortunate barber was taken next day and committed to the dungeon of the Tower. Seymour was met at the Iron Gate by Rodney, and carried by boat down the Thames as far as Lee. There, missing the ship which contained his wife, he boarded a collier bound for Newcastle, induced the master to make for Calais; owing to adverse winds, he was landed at Ostend, and awaited tidings of Arabella at Bruges (COOPER, Life and Letters of Lady Arabella Stuart; Life of Lady Arabella Stuart, by E. T. Bradley (Mrs. A. Murray-Smith), 1889). On learning her fate he removed to Paris (September), and soon after her death in October he made his peace with the king and returned to England, 10 Feb. 1615-16.

So complete was his restoration to favour that when the Prince of Wales was created K.B., 3 Nov. 1616, the same honour was conferred upon him. In April 1618 he remarried Frances, eldest daughter of Robert Devereux, second earl of Essex. On the death of his elder brother, Edward (August 1618), he took the courtesy title of Lord Beauchamp. On 22 Dec. 1620 he was returned to parliament for Marlborough, but vacated the seat almost at once on being called to the upper house as Baron Beauchamp, 14 Feb. 1620-1. On the death of his grandfather in the following April he was summoned to the House of Lords 'to take his place according to the new creation of that earldom and not otherwise.' He was a member of the committee of privileges appointed on 15 Feb. 1625-6, and brought in the reports on the petitions of the Earls of Bristol and Arundel, 30 March and 5 April 1626 [see DIGBY, JOHN, first EARL OF BRISTOL; and HOWARD, THOMAS, second EARL OF ARUNDEL].

Though by nature and habit a scholar rather than a man of action, and little in favour at court, Hertford was too influential in the country to be ignored by the king as the prospect of an appeal to arms drew near. He was appointed on 23 March 1638-9 lord-lieutenant of Somerset and the cities of Bristol, Bath, and Wells; in 1640 he was sworn of the privy council, and was created (3 June) Marquis of Hertford. Still dreaming of a peaceful settlement, he joined with the Earls of Essex and Bedford in petitioning for a return to constitutional methods of government (28 Aug. and September 1640), and was selected as one of the commissioners for the abortive treaty of Ripon (October); but the attitude assumed by the Long parliament converted him from a lukewarm into a staunch royalist. On 17 May 1641 he accepted the post of governor to the Prince of Wales, with whom he joined the king at York in April 1642. The insolent demand of the parliament that he should give an undertaking that the prince should not be conveyed out of the kingdom, he met with a dignified and decisive refusal (8 May). Having subscribed the engagement for the defence of the monarchy and protestant religion (13 June), he was appointed (2 Aug.) commissioner of array and lieutenant-general for the western counties, from Oxford to the Land's End, and from Southampton to Radnor and Cardigan, and, attended by his younger brother Francis, lord Seymour of Trowbridge, John, lord Paulet, afterwards fifth marquis of Winchester [q. v.], Sir John Stawol, and Sir Ralph Hopton (afterwards Lord Hopton [q. v.]), made an attempt to put the commission in execution at Wells, but had hardly raised five hundred horse when he was driven out of the city by Sir Edward Hungerford (1596?-1648) [q. v.]. He retreated to Sherborne, Dorset; but, finding the place untenable, withdrew to Minehead, and so by ship to Cardiff (September), sending his levies into Cornwall. In Wales he raised some two thousand men, with whom he crossed the marches, and drove the Earl of Stamford out of Hereford (14 Dec.) [see GREY, HENRY, first EARL OF STAMFORD]. Reinforced from Oxford by the royal princes, he reduced Cirencester (2 Feb.); in the summer, after the battle of Stratton (16 May), he marched into Somerset, captured in rapid succession Taunton, Bridgwater, and Dunster Castle; and, having effected a junction with Sir Ralph Hopton, left before Exeter an investing force under Sir John Berkeley (afterwards first Baron Berkelsay of Stratton) [q. v.]; and marching upon Bath, the headquarters of Sir William Waller [q. v.], drew him to an engagement, and defeated him after an obstinate struggle at Lansdown (5 July); but, being too weak to improve his advantage, he withdrew with the cavalry to Oxford, leaving Hopton with the infantry at Devizes. From Oxford he despatched Lord Wilmot to Hopton's relief, and marched upon Bristol, which surrendered on 26 July. Upon this success, disputes with the princes as to the disposal of the command of the city caused the king to recall Hertford to Oxford; and in January 1643-4 he was made groom of the stole. He joined in the overtures made by the council in that month to Essex and the Scots; was nominated commissioner for the treaty of Uxbridge on 28 Jan. 1644-5, and of the council left in charge of Oxford on the king's departure in the following May. On the surrender of the city, 24 June 1646, he compounded for his estates on the terms of the articles. He was in attendance on the king during his confinement, was one of his commissioners for the treaty of Newport (September 1648), united during his trial with the Duke of Richmond and the Earl of Southampton in praying the court to lay upon them as his advisers, the exclusive responsibility for his acts, and in procuring upon his execution permission to bury his body at Windsor. During the interregnum, after a brief confinement in his own house at Netley, Hampshire, Hertford was suffered to go at large. On the Restoration, the dukedom of Somerset and barony of Seymour, which were declared forfeit by act of parliament of 12 April 1552, were revived and conferred upon him by act of parliament passed 13 Sept. 1680. He was among the lords who welcomed Charles II at Dover on 26 May 1660, and on the following day received the Garter from the king at Canterbury, having been elected into the order at Jersey on 13 Jan. 1648-9. He died on 24 Oct. following, and was buried on 1 Nov. at Bedwyn Magna, Wiltshire. An anonymous portrait of Somerset belongs to the Duke of Beaufort; another by Vandeyck (in Lord Clarendon's possession at The Grove, Watford) was engraved and prefixed to vol. iii. of Lady Theresa Lewis's Lives of the Friends and Contemporaries of Lord Chancellor Clarendon, 1852.

By his second wife he had, with other issue, two daughters—Mary, who married Heneage Finch, second earl of Winchilsea [q. v.], and Jane, who married Charles Boyle, lord Clifford of Londesborough, son of Richard Boyle, first earl of Burlington, and second earl of Cork [q. v.]—and two sons, viz.: (1) Henry, lord Beauchamp (d. 1654), leaving, with other issue, by his wife Mary, eldest daughter of Arthur, lord Capel of Hadham, a son William, who succeeded as third duke of Somerset (d. 26 Sept. 1671, aged 20); (2) John, lord Seymour, who succeeded as fourth duke of Somerset on his nephew's death, and died without issue, 29 April 1675, when the dukedom passed to the grandsons of his father's brother, Francis, first baron Seymour of Trowbridge [see under SEYMOUR, CHARLES, sixth DUKE OF SOMERSET].

[Foster's Alumni Oxon.; Complete Peerage, s. n. 'Hertford'; Collins's Peerage, i. 474 et seq.; Courthope's Hist. Peerage; Hutchins's Dorset, i. 250; Rymer's Fœdera, ed. Sanderson, xvi. 710; Edinb. Rev. July 1896, art. x.; Harl. MS. 7003, ff. 122, 132; Birch's Memoirs of the Reign of Elizabeth, ii. 506; Court and Times of James I., i. 127; Winwood's Mem. iii. 201, 279-81; Nichols's Progresses of James I.; Metcalf's Book of Knights; Clarendon's Rebellion; Parl. Hist. ii. 76, 126, 1212, 1374-5; Lords' Journal, iii. 4, 98, 130, 499, 544, 552, v. 49, xi. 171, 358; Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1611-18, pp. 342, 349, 401, 514-16, 1638-45, and Cal. Comm. for Compounding, and for Advances of Money; Notes of the Treaty of Ripon (Camden Soc.) App. p. 79; Rushworth's Hist. Coll. pt. ii. vol. ii. pp. 1200, 1276, pt. iii. vol. i. pp. 627, 672, 686, 766, vol. ii. 130, 284, 561-573, 792, 805, pt. iv. vol. i. p. 280; White-locke's Mem.; Hist. MSS. Comm. 4th Rep. p. 308, 9th Rep. pt. ii., 10th Rep. pts. iv. and vi., 12th Rep. pts. ii. and ix., 13th Rep. pt. i.; Bates's Elenchus Motuum Nuperorum (1685), p. 142; Nicholas Papers (Camden Soc.), ii. 66; Lodge's Portraits of Illustrious Personages, ed. Bohn, v. 99; Disraeli's Curiosities of Literature, 9th ed. iv. 361; Gardiner's Histories of England and of the Great Civil War.] J. M. R.

SEYMOUR, WILLIAM DIGBY (1822-1895), county-court judge, third son of Charles Seymour, vicar of Kilonan, co. Roscommon, by Beata, daughter of Fergus Langley of Lich Finn, Tipperary, was born in Ireland on 22 Sept. 1822. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, graduating B.A. in 1844 and LL.D. in 1872. He was called to the bar at the Middle Temple on 12 June 1846, and practised on the northern circuit. By the influence of his father-in-law he was returned to parliament as one of the members for Sunderland in 1852, and his support of the liberal party was rewarded with the recordership of Newcastle in December 1854. On returning to his constituency for re-election he was defeated. In the meantime he had become connected with various commercial undertakings, notably with the Waller Gold-mining Company, of which he was chairman in 1852. His experiences were unfortunate, and in 1858 he had to make an arrangement with his creditors. In 1859 he was called before the benchers of the Middle Temple to answer charges affecting his character as a barrister in connection with some commercial transactions, and on 28 Feb. was censured by the benchers (Times, 29, 24, 25 Feb. and 4 April 1859). Seymour disputed the fairness of the decision, but he would not publish the evidence, and he was excluded from the bar mess of the northern circuit. He commenced legal proceedings against Mr. Butterworth, the publisher of the 'Law Magazine,' for giving a statement of the case with comments. The trial was heard by Lord-chief-justice Cockburn on 2-3 Dec. 1862, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff of 40s. (ib. 3 Dec. 1862 p. 10, 4 Dec. pp. 8-9).

In May 1859 Seymour was returned for Southampton, securing conservative support by a pledge not to vote against Derby's government. His failure to observe this promise was commented on by the 'Morning Herald,' and Seymour sought to institute a criminal prosecution of that paper, which was refused by Lord Campbell. Seymour was named a queen's counsel in the county palatine of Lancaster in August 1860, and on 19 Feb. 1861 a queen's counsel for England by Lord Campbell. In the same year he was employed by the government to draw up the Admiralty Reform Act.

His views grew gradually more conservative; he contested unsuccessfully Hull in 1857, Southampton in 1866, Nottingham in 1869 and 1870, Stockton in 1880, and South Shields in 1885. By the influence of his political friends he became judge of the county-court circuit No. 1, with his chief court at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in August 1880, and held that appointment at his death, which took place at Tynemouth on 16 March 1895. In February 1894 he was presented with his portrait by O. K. Robinson. He married, on 1 Sept. 1847, Emily, second daughter of Joseph John Wright, solicitor, Sunderland.

He was author of: 1. 'How to employ Capital in Western Ireland, being Answers to Questions upon the Manufacture of Beet-sugar, Flax, and Chicory in connection with a Land Investment in the West of Ireland,' 2nd edit. 1851; with an appendix, a letter from M. Leon, 1851. 2. 'The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, with summary notes and index,' 1855; 2nd edit. 1857. 3. 'The Wail of Montrose; or the Wrongs of Shipping,' 1859; 2nd edit. 1859. 4. 'Waste Land Reclamation and Peasant Proprietorship, with suggestions for the Establishment of a Land Bank in Ireland,' 1881. 5. 'The Hebrew Psalter: a new metrical translation,' 1882.

[Debrett's House of Commons, 1891, p. 337; Times, 18 March 1895, p. 10; Illustrated London News, 1853 xxii. 132, 28 March 1895 p. 350, with portrait; Pall Mall Budget, 21 March 1895, p. 4, with portrait; Law Mag. and Law Rev. 1862 xiii. 158-86, 363-6, 1863, xiv. 181-338, xv. 1-42; W. D. Seymour, The Middle Temple Benchers and the Northern Circuit Committee, 1862.] G. O. B.

SEYMOUR-CONWAY, FRANÇOIS, first MARQUIS OF HERTFORD (1719-1794). [See CONWAY.]

SHAA. [See SHAW.]

SHACKLETON, ABRAHAM (1697-1771), schoolmaster, the youngest of six children, was born at Shackleton House, near Bingley in the West Riding of Yorkshire in 1697. His parents were quakers. He did not begin Latin till he was twenty, but worked so hard that he attained a good Latin prose style. He became a teacher in the school of David Hall of Skipton, Yorkshire, and married Margaret Wilkinson, a relative of the master. He removed to Ireland, and became tutor to the children of John Duckett of Duckett's Grove, co. Carlow, and to those of William Cooper of Cooper Hill in the same district. Both were considerable land owners, and, like himself, members of the Society of Friends. At their suggestion he opened a boarding school at Ballytore, co. Kildare, on 1 March 1728, and continued its headmaster till 1766. During this time he educated four hundred boys of English, Scottish, or French descent, thirty-four of Anglo-Irish families, and thirty-four of original Irish origin. Dr. Richard Brocklesby (1722-1797) [q. v.] was one of his pupils; but the most distinguished was Edmund Burke, who entered on 26 May 1741. Shackleton recognised his ability, and they continued firm friends throughout life. In 1769 he went to the yearly meeting of the Society of Friends in London, and afterwards paid Burke a visit at Beaconsfield. His house in Ballytore was called Griesmount, but the present building of that name, though begun in his time, was completed after he had resigned the mastership in 1766. He died on 24 June 1771, and was buried at Ballytore; he left one son, Richard (see below), and one daughter, Elizabeth, who married Maurice Raynor, and had one son, William. Burke says of him: 'He was indeed a man of singular piety, rectitude, and virtue, and he had, along with these qualities, a native elegance of manners which nothing but genuine good nature and unaffected simplicity of heart can give.'

RICHARD SHACKLETON (1728-1792), schoolmaster, son of the above, was born at Ballytore, co. Kildare, in 1728. He was educated at his father's school, where he was a contemporary of Edmund Burke, and they became lifelong friends. He continued his studies at Trinity College, Dublin, and in 1766 succeeded his father as master of Ballytore school. He paid a visit to Burke nearly every year, and sixty-four letters from Burke to him are printed in 'The Leadbeater Papers.' Their only difference was in 1770, when a short account of Burke's family and education, written by Shackleton, accidentally found its way into the newspapers. Burke says: 'I am sure I have nothing in my family, my circumstances, or my conduct that an honest man ought to be ashamed of. But the more circumstances of all these that are brought out, the more materials are furnished for malice to work upon.' Shackleton explained how the accident had occurred, and how much he regretted the publication. Burke wrote a kind letter in reply, and their friendship was uninterrupted. In 1779 he was succeeded as master by his son Abraham. On 21 Aug. he was taken ill on his way from Ballytore to Mount Mellick, Queen's County, and there died of fever on 20 Aug. 1792. Burke, in a letter written on 8 Sept. 1792, says: 'Indeed we have had a loss. I console myself under it by going over the virtues of my old friend, of which I believe I am one of the earliest witnesses and the most warm admirers and lovers.' He married, first, Elizabeth Fuller, and had four children, and two years after her death married, secondly, Elizabeth Carleton, who also bore children, among them Mary Leadbeater [q. v.] In the latter's 'Poems' are seven short poems by her father. Burke had Shackleton's portrait painted by Richard Sesson.

[Poems by Mary Leadbeater, London, 1808; Devonshire House Portraits; Annals of Ballymore, London, 1862; Prior's Life of Burke.]

N. M.

SHACKLETON, JOHN (d. 1767), portrait-painter, is principally known as a painter of several portraits of George II, Queen Caroline, and other members of the royal family from 1780 onwards. In April 1749 he succeeded William Kent (1684-1748) [q. v.] as court painter. The portraits are stiff and uninteresting, usually in official robes, but they are by no means bad likenesses. In 1765 Shackleton was one of the original committee who drew up the first proposal for a royal academy of London for the improvement of painting, sculpture, and architecture. He exhibited portraits at the Free Society of Artists in 1766, and died on 16 March 1767. There are portraits by him in the National Portrait Gallery, the Foundling Hospital, Fishmongers' Hall, and most of the royal palaces.

[Redgrave's Dict. of Artists; Walpole's Anecdotes of Painting; Pye's Patronage of British Art.]

L. G.

SHACKLOCK, RICHARD (fl. 1575), catholic divine, was possibly of Lancashire extraction, and descended from the Shacklock family of Mostyn (Booker, Hist. of Blackley, p. 183). He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. 1555-6, M.A. 1559, and was elected fellow of his college in the latter year. Shortly after Elizabeth's accession his devotion to the catholic faith led him to retire to Louvain, where he devoted himself to the study of civil law. The date of his death has not been ascertained.

He published: A translation of the letter of Osorio de Fonseca to Queen Elizabeth, Antwerp, 1565, 8vo (running title, 'A Pearle for a Prince'), answered by Hartwell (see STRYPE, Annals, i. ii. 84); and Cardinal Hosius's treatise, 'De Heresibus' under the title, 'A most excellent treatise of the begynning of heresyes in oure tyme,' Antwerp, 1566. He was also author of 'Epitaphium in mortem Cuthberti Scoti quondam episcopi Cestrensis,' which was translated into English and answered by Thomas Drant [q. v.]

[Fulke's Answer, ii. 4 (Parker Soc.); Strype's Annals, ii. ii. 710; Cooper's Athenae Cant.; Dodd's Church Hist.; Tanner's Bibl. Brit.; Warton's Engl. Poet. iii. 347; Ames's Typogr. Antiq. ed. Herbert, p. 371, 1610, 1612.]

W. A. S.

SHADRACH, AZARIAH (1774-1844), Welsh evangelical writer, was born on 24 June 1774 at Garn Deilo fach in the parish of Llanfair, near Fishguard, Pembrokeshire, being the fifth son of Henry and Ann Shadrach, natives of the neighbouring parish of Nevern. He had scarcely any educational opportunities, but when grown up he engaged himself as a farm servant to a local independent minister, who was reputed to possess a good library, on the condition that he should be allowed access to his employer's books after his day's work. At his master's suggestion he decided to enter the independent ministry, and in 1798 he went, as was then usual, on a preaching tour to North Wales, where he was induced by Dr. George Lewis [q. v.] to remain, undertaking the duties of schoolmaster, first at Hirnant, near Bala, and then at Pennal and Derwenlas, near Machynlleth. Towards the end of 1802 he was ordained pastor of the independent church at Llanrwst, at a salary of 5*l.* a year. Here he was largely instrumental in suppressing the wakes or 'mabsantau' which then flourished in the district. In November 1806 he removed to North Cardiganshire, where he had charge of the churches of Talybont and Llanbadarn. To these he added in 1819 the charge of a new church which he then formed at Aberystwyth, and for which, two years later, he built a chapel, becoming himself responsible for its cost. Owing to ill health he resigned his charges in August 1835, but continued to preach until his death on 18 Jan. 1844. He was buried at St. Michael's Church, Aberystwyth.

Shadrach was the author of no less than twenty-seven works, all, with one exception, written in Welsh. Some of them ran into several editions, and it is estimated that sixty thousand copies of his various books were sold altogether. They were mostly homiletic in character, being sketches of sermons he had previously delivered. Owing to his liberal use of allegory he has been styled, somewhat extravagantly, 'the Bunyan of Wales.' Perhaps his best work was 'A Looking Glass; neu Ddrych y Gwrthgilywr,' &c. (Carmarthen, 1807, and numerous reprints), which was translated into English by Edward S. Byam, sometime chief magistrate of Mauritius, under the title 'The Backslider's Mirror: a popular Welsh treatise, translated from the ancient British Language,' London, 1845.

Shadrach was credited with the possession of a prophetic faculty, and is specially remembered about Aberdovey on account of a curious ballad which he wrote in 1836, foretelling many unforeseen events which have since come to pass in the district. To his last work, 'Cerbyd o Goed Libanus' (Aberystwyth, 1840), are appended some autobiographical notes.

[A full biography by the Rev. Josiah Jones of Machynlleth was published, first in Y Beirniad, and subsequently in 1863 in book form. See also Rees and Thomas, Hanes Eglwysy Annibynol Cymru, iv. 184-8; Jones's Geiriadur Bywgraffyddol, ii. 542-4.] D. L. T.

SHADWELL, SIR CHARLES FREDERICK ALEXANDER (1814-1886), admiral, born in 1814, fourth son of Sir Lancelot Shadwell [q. v.], was in 1827 entered as a scholar at the Royal Naval College at Portsmouth, and from it passed into the navy in 1829. In 1833 he passed his examination, and was made lieutenant on 28 June 1838. He was then appointed to the 36-gun frigate Castor, going out to the Mediterranean, where in 1840 he was present at the operations on the coast of Syria, including the capture of St. Jean d'Acre. In December 1841 he was appointed first lieutenant of the Fly, employed for more than four years in surveying in Torres Straits and on the northern coast of Australia [see JUKES, JOSEPH BATES]. On the Fly being paid out of commission, he was promoted to the rank of commander, 27 June 1846. He then studied for some time at the Royal Naval College, taking a certificate in 'steam,' and devoting himself more especially to nautical astronomy. In February 1850 he was appointed to the Sphinx, which he took out to the East Indies, and in her had an active share in the Burma war of 1852, for which he twice received the thanks of the governor-general in council; on 7 Feb. 1853 was advanced to the rank of captain, and on 5 Dec. 1853 was nominated a C.B.

In August 1856 he commissioned the Highflyer for the China station, where in 1857 he took part in the operations in the Canton river, leading up to the capture of Canton in December [see SMYTHUR, SIR MICHAEL, 1802-1887], and in the disastrous attack on the Taku forts on 25 June 1859 [see HORN, SIR JAMES, 1808-1881], when, in leading the landing party across the mud flat, he received a severe wound in the ankle, which rendered him permanently lame. In January 1860 he was relieved from the command of the Highflyer, and returned to England.

From February 1861 to August 1862 he commanded the Aboukir of 90 guns in the Mediterranean and West Indies; from October 1862 to June 1864, the Hastings flagship of Sir Lewis Jones at Queenstown; and from June 1864 till his promotion to the rank of rear-admiral on 15 Jan. 1869 was captain-superintendent of the Gosport victualling-yard and of Haslar Hospital. From August 1871 to May 1875 he was commander-in-chief in China, and was made K.C.B. on 24 May 1873. From 1878 to 1881 he was president of the Royal Naval College at Greenwich, after which he lived in retirement at Melkham in Wiltshire, where he died, unmarried, on 1 March 1886.

Despite his long, and in some instances brilliant, service, Shadwell had rather the temperament of a student than of a warrior. He was deeply attached to the study of nautical astronomy, on different details of which he published a large number of pamphlets. For many years he was engaged on a work on the subject, which gradually assumed almost encyclopædic proportions without ever reaching his high ideal of completeness; and it was still unfinished at his death. He was elected F.R.S. on 8 June 1861, and was a fellow of the Royal Astronomical and Royal Geographical societies.

[O'Byrne's Nav. Biogr. Dict.; Times, 4 March 1886; Navy Lists; personal knowledge.]

J. K. L.

SHADWELL, SIR JOHN (1671-1747), physician, son of Thomas Shadwell [q. v.] and Anne, daughter of Thomas Gibbs of Norwich, was born in Middlesex, probably at Chelsea, in 1671. On 15 May 1685 he matriculated at Oxford from University College, whence he migrated to All Souls' College. He graduated B.A. on 1 June 1689 (3 Nov. 1688, according to the register at All Souls' College), M.A. on 26 April 1693, M.B. on 19 April 1697, and M.D. on 5 June 1700. As physician in ordinary to Queen Anne he was admitted a fellow of the College of Physicians on 22 Dec. 1712. On 30 Nov. 1701 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and he was admitted on 8 Dec. He read one paper before the society, an 'Account of an Extraordinary Skeleton' (Philosophical Transactions, 1741, xli. 820). He was appointed physician-extraordinary to Queen Anne on 9 Nov. 1709, and on 9 Feb. 1712 was sworn one of the physicians in ordinary, in the room of Dr. Martin Lister [q. v.], being succeeded in his former office by Dr. Hans Sloane [q. v.] The accounts of the queen's illness in December 1713-14 in Boyer's 'History of the Reign of Queen Anne' are derived from Shadwell's letters to the Duke and Duchess of Shrewsbury. Boyer recorded Shadwell's opinion that the queen died of 'gouty humour translating itself upon the brain.' He continued to be physician in ordinary to George I and George II, and was knighted on 12 June 1716. He long resided in Windmill Street, and in 1735 withdrew from practice and retired to France, where he remained until 1740. He died at Windmill Street on 4 Jan. 1747. He was buried on 8 Jan. at Bath Abbey, where there is a tomb with an elaborate epitaph to his memory.

Sir John Shadwell was twice married; by his first wife, who died on 14 April 1722, he had issued one son and three daughters. He married, secondly, Ann Binns, at Somerset House chapel, on 12 March 1725; and on 29 June 1731 he made his will in her favour. Lady Shadwell survived until 1777.

[Munk's Coll. of Phys.; Gent. Mag.; Genealogist, new ser. vi. 98; Foster's Alumni Oxon.; Historical Reg. 1722; Malcolm's Londoniam Redivivum, iv. 295.] W. W. W.

SHADWELL, SIR LANCELOT (1779-1850), last vice-chancellor of England, eldest son of Lancelot Shadwell of Lincoln's Inn, barrister-at-law, an eminent conveyancer, by his wife Elizabeth, third daughter of Charles Whitmore of Southampton, was born on 3 May 1779. He was educated at Eton, and subsequently went to St. John's College, Cambridge, where, in 1800, he became seventh wrangler, obtained the second chancellor's medal, and graduated B.A. He was elected a fellow of his college on 28 March 1801, graduated M.A. in 1803, and received the honorary degree of LL.D. in 1842. Shadwell was admitted a member of Lincoln's Inn on 30 June 1797, and was called to the bar on 10 Feb. 1803. After practising eighteen years with much success as a junior in the court of chancery, he was appointed a king's counsel on 8 Dec. 1821, and took his seat within the bar on the first day of Hilary term 1822 (J. B. MOORE, Reports of Cases in the Common Pleas and Exchequer Chamber, 1824, vi. 441). In spite of much pecuniary loss, he refused to follow the practice then prevalent of taking briefs in more than one equity court, and honourably confined himself to practising before the lord chancellor, not being able, as he said, 'to induce himself to think that it is consistent with justice, much less with honour, to undertake to lead a cause and either forsake it altogether or give it an imperfect, hasty, and divided attention—consequences that inevitably result from the attempt to conduct causes before two judges sitting at the same time in different places' (Gent. Mag. 1850, ii. 545). At the general election in June 1826 Shadwell obtained a seat in the House of Commons for the borough of Ripon through the influence of Miss Elizabeth Sophia Lawrence [see AISLABIE, JOHN], under whose will he subsequently received a handsome bequest. On 14 Feb. 1827 he introduced a bill for the limitation of a writ of right and for the amendment of the law of dower, but it did not get beyond the committee stage (Parliamentary Debates, 2nd ser. xvi. 471-3, 474-5, xvii. 94, 174). His parliamentary career was short, for on 31 Oct. 1827 he was appointed vice-chancellor of England in the place of Sir Anthony Hart (London Gazette, 1827, ii. 2250). On 13 Nov. following he was sworn a member of the privy council and knighted (ib. 1827, ii. 2385, 2386). He presided in the vice-chancellor's court for nearly twenty-three years. During this period he twice filled the office of a commissioner of the great seal: from 23 April 1835 to 16 Jan. 1836 in conjunction with Sir C. O. Pepys (afterwards Lord Cottenham) and Sir J. B. Bosanquet, and again from 19 June to 16 July 1850 in conjunction with Lord Langdale and Sir R. M. Rolfe (afterwards Lord Cranworth). On 24 June he was seized with a sudden illness, which prevented him from sitting again during the continuance of the second commission. He died at his residence, Barn Elms, Surrey, on 10 Aug. 1850, aged 71, and was buried in Barnes churchyard.

Shadwell married, first, on 8 Jan. 1805, Harriet, daughter of Anthony Richardson of Powis Place, Great Ormond Street, a London merchant, and sister of Sir John Richardson, some time a justice of the common pleas, by whom he had Sir Charles Frederick Alexander Shadwell [q. v.], and five other sons. His first wife died on 25 May 1814, and on 4 Jan. 1816 he married, secondly, Frances, third and youngest daughter of Captain Locke, by whom he had six sons and five daughters. Shadwell's second wife died on 27 Oct. 1854, aged 66.

Shadwell, who was the last 'vice-chancellor of England,' was a learned and able judge, with a handsome presence and courteous manners. Of his complete subjection to Bethell, the leader of his court, many stories are told (see NASH, Life of Richard, Lord Westbury, 1888, i. 69, 84-5, 95). He was president of the Society of Psychrolutes, the qualification for the membership of that body being the daily practice of bathing out of doors from November to March (ROGER, History of the 'Old Water Colour' Society, 1891, ii. 210-11). He was in the habit of bathing every day, whatever the weather, in one of the creeks of the Thames near Barn Elme, and while thus engaged is said to have granted an injunction on one occasion in the long vacation. In his early days he was an active pedestrian (see ARNOULD, Memoir of Lord Denman, 1878, i. 17, 25), and in 1797 he served as a member of the light-horse volunteers (LORD COLCHESTER, Diary and Correspondence, 1861, i. 114). He was elected a bencher of Lincoln's Inn on 30 Jan. 1822, and acted as treasurer in 1838.

His portrait, painted in 1842 by Thomas Phillips, R.A., is in the possession of his inn. His decisions will be found in the 'Reports' of Nicholas Simons (ii. 41 to xvii. 166).

The vice-chancellor's eighth son, LAWRENCE SHADWELL (1823-1887), born in July 1823, was educated at Eton, and entered the army as ensign in the 98th foot on 26 April 1841. He served in the China expedition of 1842, the Punjab campaign of 1848-9, and in the Crimean war of 1854-6. He held the appointment of assistant quartermaster-general in the Crimea during the greater part of the war. After his return to England, he was assistant quartermaster-general to the troops in the northern district from April 1857 to September 1861, in Nova Scotia from January to August 1862, and in the south-western district of England from April 1864 to February 1866. From 1866 to 1871 he was military assistant at the war offices. He was promoted to the rank of major-general on 6 March 1868, and was created a companion of the Bath on 2 June 1869. He was granted a reward for distinguished and meritorious services in January 1874, and was advanced to the rank of lieutenant-general on 27 April 1879, and to that of general on 1 July 1881. He retired from the army on 25 July 1881, and died at Reading on 16 Aug. 1887, aged 64. Lawrence Shadwell married, on 2 Aug. 1853, Helen Frances, daughter of the Rev. Edward Coleridge, vicar of Mapledurham, Oxfordshire, and fellow of Eton College.

[Foss's Judges of England, 1864, ix. 261-4; Hardy's Memoirs of Lord Langdals, 1852, ii. 268-68; Georgian Era, 1833, ii. 552; Law Times, xv. 467; Legal Observer, xl. 305; De Gex and Smale's Reports, vol. iv. pp. ix-xi; Illustrated London News, 17 Aug. 1850 (with portrait); Brayley and Britton's Surrey, 1850, iii. 487, 488; Ann. Reg. 1860, app. to chron. pp. 251-2; Gant. Mag. 1805, i. 88, 1814 i. 628, 1845 ii. 423, 1864 ii. 644; Baker's History of

St. John's College, Cambridge, 1869, pt. i. pp. 811, 812; Grad. Cantabr. 1856, p. 341; Stappylton's Eton School Lists, 1864, pp. 14, 21, 172; Official Return of Lists of Members of Parliament, pt. ii. p. 309; Haydn's Book of Dignities, 1890; Lincoln's Inn Registers; Army Lists.] G. F. R. B

SHADWELL, THOMAS (1642?-1692), dramatist and post-laureate, was grandson of George Shadwell, and son of John Shadwell of the parish of Broomhill, Norfolk. He claimed descent from the family of Shadwell of Lyndowne, Staffordshire. John Shadwell, who had eleven children, was of the Middle Temple, and lost much of his property at the civil war. He was a justice of the peace for Middlesex, Norfolk, and Suffolk, and after the Restoration was appointed recorder of Galway and receiver there to the Duke of York, and subsequently was attorney-general at Tangier under William O'Brien, second earl of Inchiquin [q.v.]. He was buried at Oxburgh, Norfolk, on 2 March 1684 (Blomefield, Norfolk, vi. 197; Oxburgh Register).

Shadwell was born in 1640 or 1642 at Broomhill House in the parish of Westing (cf. Caius College Register; Notes and Queries, 8th ser. iv. 109). He was educated at home for five years, and afterwards for a year at the school of Bury St. Edmunds. On 17 Dec. 1656 he was admitted a pensioner to Caius College, Cambridge, 'then aged 14,' but he left without taking any degree, and entered the Middle Temple. After studying there for some time, he travelled abroad, and on his return turned his attention to literature.

Shadwell's first play, 'The Sullan Lovers,' based on Molière's 'Les Fâcheux,' was brought out at Lincoln's Inn Fields on 5 May 1668. It was acted twelve days (Shadwell's wife taking the part of the heroine, Emilia), and was revived when the court was at Dover in 1670 (Downes, Roscius Anglicanus, 1708, p. 29). In the preface Shadwell avowed himself a disciple of Ben Jonson, his endeavour being to represent variety of humours, as was his practice of his master. In September 1668 Pepys asked Shadwell to dinner; but when Shadwell's second play, 'The Royal Shepherdess,' which was adapted from Fountain's 'The Rewards of Virtue,' was produced before a crowded house in February 1669, Pepys said it was 'the silliest for words and design and everything that ever I saw in my whole life.' A much better play, 'The Humourists,' produced at the Theatre Royal in 1670, is said by Gildon to have met with many enemies on its first appearance. 'The Miser,' 1671, is an adaptation from Molière, but contains sight characters not to be found in 'L'Avare.' In the preface, Shadwell says that Molière's part in the play had not suffered in his hands: 'Tis not barrenness of wit or invention that makes us borrow from the French, but laziness.' 'The Miser' was dedicated to the Earl of Dorset. Nell Gwyn wrote: 'My Lord of Dorset . . . drinks ale with Shadwell and Mr. Harris at the Duke's House all day long' (Notes and Queries, 4th ser. vii. 3).

'Epsom Wells,' one of Shadwell's best plays in spite of its coarseness, was acted at Dorset Garden in 1672. Shadwell says, in the dedication to his patron the Duke of Newcastle, that the town was 'extremely kind to it.' Sir Charles Sedley wrote a prologue, and, according to Dryden, gave the author help in writing the play. In 1673 Shadwell constructed an opera out of Shakespeare's 'Tempest,' with the sub-title of 'The Enchanted Island,' which was given at Dorset Garden with much success, and printed in 4to (Downes; cf. GENEST, i. 155). In the dedication (to Monmouth) of 'Psyche,' produced at Dorset Garden in February 1674, Shadwell alludes to the charge that others wrote the best parts of his plays. This opera, which is in rhymed verse, was based on Molière, and was played for about eight nights. The scenery cost 800l. 'The Libertine,' a tragedy with Don Juan as hero, and 'The Virtuoso' were brought out in 1676. In the dedication to the former, Shadwell replied to the charge of hasty writing preferred against him by Elkanah Settle (q. v.) in a postscript to 'Love and Revenge,' 1675; in 'The Virtuoso' he regretted that want of means prevented him devoting his whole time to the leisurely writing of 'correct' comedies. In 'Timon of Athens,' 1678, Shadwell spoke of the inimitable hand of Shakespeare, but added, 'Yet I can truly say I have made it into a play.' 'The True Widow,' produced in 1679 or perhaps 1678, and dedicated to Sedley, was not popular, though Shadwell was well satisfied with it. 'The Woman Captain,' 1680, was followed by 'The Lancashire Witches,' 1681, which was successful in spite of the efforts of a party who said that the character of the chaplain, Smerk, was an insult to the church of England. Much of the play was struck out by the licenser before it was acted, but it was afterwards printed in full (on its coarseness, cf. Spectator, No. 141).

In 1671 Shadwell referred to Dryden, in the preface to 'The Humourists,' as his 'particular friend'; he joined Crowne and Dryden in an attack on Settle's 'Empress of Morocco' in 1674, and in 1679 Dryden contributed a prologue to Shadwell's 'True Widow.' But in the preface to his first play (1668) Shadwell had written in opposition to views recently expressed in Dryden's 'Essay of Dramatic Poesy,' while in 'The Virtuoso' (1676) he sneered at contemporary dramatists, and Dryden must have felt that some of the remarks related to his writings and to 'Aureng-Zebe' in particular. There was, however, no open feud until 1682, when Dryden produced his second satire on Shaftesbury, 'The Medal,' prefaced by an epistle to the whigs. Shadwell replied with 'The Medal of John Bayes: a Satire against Folly and Knavery,' and with a prose 'Epistle to the Tories,' in which, as well as in the verse, he grossly libelled his opponent, both as poet and man, calling him an 'abandoned rascal,' 'half wit, half fool.' Shadwell is supposed also to have been the author of a rather less offensive satire, 'The Tory Poets,' 1682, in which Dryden is attacked, in company with Otway and others. Dryden took his revenge in 'MacFlecknoe, or a Satire on the True Blue Protestant Poet, T. S.,' published in October 1682, where Shadwell is represented as the literary son and successor of the poetaster Richard Flecknoe (q. v.) In this savage attack it was alleged that Shadwell was void of wit, and 'never deviates into sense,' and there were allusions to Shadwell's 'mountain belly,' slowness of composition, comparison of himself with Jonson, and the help he obtained from Sedley. A month later Dryden wrote another bitter attack in Nahum Tate's second part of 'Absalom and Achitophel,' where, under the name of Og, he described Shadwell as a drunken 'mass of foul corrupted matter,' and ridiculed his poverty and his habit of taking opium.

In the following year Shadwell and Thomas Hunt (1627?–1688) (q. v.) attacked Dryden in 'Some Reflections upon the pretended Parallel in the play called the Duke of Guise,' 1683, and Dryden retorted in the 'Vindication of the Duke of Guise,' in which reference was made especially to Shadwell's drinking habits and to his ignorance of the classics. Shadwell was again attacked in a scarce eulogy on Dryden, 'The Laurel,' 1685. It was not until 1687 that Shadwell, in a translation of the 'Tenth Satire of Juvenal,' dedicated to Sir Charles Sedley, and written as a counterblast to a translation by Dryden's friend, Henry Higden (q. v.), replied to 'MacFlecknoe.' In this he rather proved his dulness by taking literally Dryden's reference to him as an Irishman. In conclusion he alleged that Dryden, when taxed with the authorship of the satire, 'denied it with all the execrations he could think of.' There is, however, abundant proof that Dryden made no secret of the authorship.

After an interval of seven years Shadwell produced one of his best plays, 'The Squire of Alsatia' (May 1688), in which the rogues make free use of their cant language. The play ran for thirteen nights, and the author's third night brought him in 180*l.*, '16*l.* more than any other poet ever did.' The title first proposed seems to have been the 'Alsatia Bully' (Hist. MSS. Comm. 5th Rep. p. 198, 12th Rep. pt. v. p. 119).

At the Revolution Dryden lost the laureateship, and was succeeded by Shadwell, as poet-laureate and historiographer royal. The salary of 300*l.* a year was sometimes in arrear (ib. 13th Rep. v. 373, 14th Rep. vi. 166). The lord chamberlain, on being asked why he did not give the laureateship to a better poet, is reported to have said, 'I do not pretend to say how great a poet Shadwell may be, but I am sure he is an honest man.' Besides some loyal poems Shadwell produced in 1689 the comedy 'Bury Fair,' based partly on the Duke of Newcastle's 'Triumphant Widow' and Molière's 'Les Précieuses Ridicules.' In the dedication to Lord Dorset Shadwell says that it was written during an eight months' illness, and that for nearly ten years his ruin had been designed, and he had been kept from the exercise of a profession which would have afforded him a competent living. After the 'Amorous Bigot' in 1690, Shadwell brought out 'The Scowrers' (1691), an excellent but coarse comedy, which gives an interesting picture of the times.

Shadwell died suddenly on 19 Nov. 1692, and was buried at Chelsea on the 24th. An article upon him appeared in Peter Motteux's 'Gentleman's Journal' for November; and in a funeral sermon, by Dr. Nicholas Brady, printed in 1693, Shadwell is highly praised as a complete gentleman and an unalterable friend, with a deep sense of religion. The report that he died of an overdose of opium is rendered probable by Brady's remark that 'he never took his dose of opium but he solemnly recommended himself to God by prayer, as if he were then about to resign up his soul.' Shadwell's will (P. C. O. 231 Fane) is without date, but on 18 Dec. 1692 Ellinor Leigh, wife of Anthony Leigh, of St. Bride's parish, gentleman, made affidavit that she had been present at the execution of the will in 1690. Probate was granted to the widow, Anne, daughter of Thomas Gibbs, late of Norwich, proctor and public notary. Shadwell left rings to the Earl of Dorset, Sir Charles Sedley, William Jephson, and Colonel Edmund Ashton, 'my most dear friends by whom I have been extremely obliged.' He wished to be buried in flannel. To his son John he left 5*l.* for mourning, together with his books, including Hobbes's 'Works,' with a warning of 'some ill opinions' of Hobbes concerning government. He left his property, including his interest in the Dorset Garden Theatre, to his 'diligent, careful, and provident' wife, commending to her the interests of his children, especially his little daughter Anne (afterwards Mrs. Oldfield). Mrs. Shadwell, as we have seen, was an actress; she appeared in Otway's 'Don Carlos' in 1676, in 'Timon of Athens' in 1678, and was living at Chelsea in 1696.

Estimates of Shadwell's literary powers differ widely. Rochester said that 'if Shadwell had burnt all he wrote, and printed all he spoke, he would have had more wit and humour than any other poet.' Elsewhere, Rochester praised 'Hasty Shadwell and slow Wycherley,' while Addison, in the 'Spectator,' applauds his humour (No. 35). Shadwell depended, like Jonson—whom he vainly tried to imitate—for the amusement of his hearers on the 'humours' of his characters; he had little wit, though it is not fair to bracket him, as Dryden did, with Settle. His comedies are useful for the vivid account they give of the life of his time. Although no poet, he was, as Scott says, an acute observer of nature, and he showed considerable skill in invention. He seems to have been naturally coarse, and was grossly indecent without designing to corrupt.

The dates of publication of Shadwell's plays were as follows: 1. 'The Sullen Lovers,' 1668. 2. 'The Royal Shepherdess,' 1669. 3. 'The Humourists,' 1671. 4. 'The Miser,' 1672. 5. 'Epsom Wells,' 1673. 6. 'Psyche,' 1675. 7. 'The Virtuoso,' 1676. 8. 'The Libertine,' 1676. 9. 'Timon of Athens,' 1678. 10. 'A True Widow,' 1679. 11. 'The Woman Captain,' 1680. 12. 'The Lancashire Witches,' 1681. 13. 'The Squire of Alsatia,' 1688. 14. 'Bury Fair,' 1689. 15. 'The Amorous Bigot,' 1690. 16. 'The Scowrers,' 1691. 17. 'The Volunteers,' 1693 (posthumous, with a dedication to the queen, signed by the widow, and a prologue by D'Urfey). A play called 'The Innocent Impostors' is also referred to Shadwell, but cannot be traced (Hist. MSS. Comm. 4th Rep. App. pp. 280-1). Shadwell published also the following occasional verses, in folio form, besides the translation from Juvenal and 'Medal of John Bayes' already noticed: 1. 'A Lenten Prologue refused by the Players' (in reply to the 'Medal'), 1683. 2. 'A Congratulatory Poem on His Highness the Prince of Orange's Coming into England,' 1680. 3. 'A Congratulatory Poem to the most Illustrious Queen Mary, upon her arrival into England,' 1689. 4. 'Ode to the King on his Return from Ireland,' 1690. 5. 'Ode on the Anniversary of the King's Birth,' 1690. 6. 'Votum Perrenne: a Poem to the King on New Year's Day,' 1692. Other verses are in Gildon's 'Poetical Remains of . . . Mr. Shadwell,' &c., 1698. A 'Song for St. Cecilia's Day,' 1690, is given in Nichols's 'Select Collection of Poems,' v. 298-301.

Shadwell's eldest son (afterwards Sir John Shadwell [q.v.]) placed a small white marble monument in the Poet's Corner in Westminster Abbey, the inscription upon which is incorrect (cf. STANLEY, Westminster Abbey, 1868, p. 278), and in 1720 brought out a collected edition of his father's dramatic works, in four volumes, with a dedication to George I. A portrait by S. Gribelin is prefixed to this edition; an anonymous mezzotint by W. Faithorne, jun., after a painting of Kerseboom's, is also said to represent Shadwell (NOBLE, Continuation of Granger, 1806, i. 255). George Clint [q.v.] painted a portrait (which now belongs to Mr. J. J. Coleman of Carrow Abbey, Norwich) from Faithorne's engraving; it shows a resemblance in person between Shadwell and his master, Ben Jonson. Clint's painting was engraved by Duveen.

CHARLES SHADWELL (Æ. 1710-1720), a younger son of Thomas Shadwell, wrote plays which were published at Dublin in two volumes in 1720. In the dedication of this collection to Lady Newtown, to whom he owed many obligations, Shadwell refers to his father, and says that it was reduced circumstances that led him to be a poet. He seems to have served in the army in Portugal, and in 1710 was supervisor of the excise in Kent. His first piece, 'The Fair Quaker of Deal' (1710), was dedicated to his friends in Kent. It was produced at the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, with great success; thanks partly to the acting of Miss Santlow as the heroine. The 'Humours of the Army' appeared in 1718, with a dedication to Major-general Newton, governor of Londonderry, under whom Shadwell had served in Portugal. Shadwell's other plays, acted at the Smock Alley Theatre, Dublin, and printed in 1720, were: (1) 'Irish Hospitality;' (2) 'The Plotting Lovers;' (3) 'The Hasty Wedding;' (4) 'The Sham Prince;' (5) 'Rotherich O'Connor.'

[A short life was prefixed to the collected edition of Shadwell's Works, 1720. See also Biogr. Dramatica; Biogr. Britannica; Genest, vol. i.; Langbaine's Lives; Whincop's Dramatic Lists; Jacob's Poetical Register; Gent. Mag.

1738 p. 235, 1745 p. 99, 1819 ii. 120; Malone's Dryden; Austin and Ralph's Lives of the Poets-Laureates; Dryden's Works, ed. Scott; Nichols's Lit. Anecd. i. 5, 385, vii. 353; Elwin's Pope, iii. 354, iv. 316, 340; Ward's Dramatic Literature, ii. 572-7; Notes and Queries, passim; Faulkner's Chelsea; Hist. MSS. Comm. 6th Rep. pp. 749, 764, 7th Rep. p. 806. Criticism upon Shadwell's writings will be found in the Retrospective Review, xvi. 55-96; Colburn's New Monthly Magazine, new ser. iii. 292, 353; Blackwood's Magazine, ix. 280-2; information kindly supplied by James Hooper, esq., Norwich.]

G. A. A.

SHAFTESBURY, EARLS OF. [See COOPER, ANTHONY ASHLEY, first EARL, 1621-1688; COOPER, ANTHONY ASHLEY, third EARL, 1671-1713; COOPER, ANTHONY ASHLEY, seventh EARL, 1801-1855.]

SHAIRP, JOHN CAMPBELL (1819-1885), professor of poetry at Oxford, was born at Houstoun, West Lothian, on 30 July 1819. His father, Major Norman Shairp, served in India, and his mother was Elizabeth Binning Campbell, daughter of John Campbell of Kildalloig, Argyllshire. Through his great-grandmother, Anne Scott of Harden, Shairp was a lineal descendant of 'the flower of Yarrow' [see under SCOTT, WALTER, 1550?-1629?]. He thus claimed kinship both with Celt and borderer (Principal Shairp and his Friends, p. 328). After preliminary training by a tutor, he was educated at Edinburgh academy, and at the end of his school-days made his first acquaintance with Wordsworth's poetry. From 1836 to 1839 he was at Glasgow University, where he stood first in logic and moral philosophy. As an active member of the Psal Club, which discussed public questions, and as member of a literary coterie that included his senior Norman Macleod, Henry Douglas (afterwards bishop of Bombay), whose sister he married, and others, he rapidly became a good speaker and a skilled critic and expositor of poetry. In his holidays he began adventurous rambles in the highlands and on the borders, which he continued late in life.

In 1840 Shairp passed as Snell exhibitioner from Glasgow to Balliol College, Oxford, somewhat vaguely designing to take orders. With Arthur Hugh Clough [q.v.], John Duke Coleridge (afterwards Lord Coleridge), and others, he formed at Balliol lasting friendships, chronicling his impressions in his graceful 'Balliol Scholars' ('Glen Dessaray and other Poems'). He was much impressed by Newman, for whom he retained a lasting respect. In 1842 he won the Newdigate prize for a poem on Charles XII; it gained the favourable notice of Charles John (Bernadotte), king of Sweden. Failing to secure an Oriel fellowship, Shairp became in 1846 an assistant-master at Rugby under Tait. He proved a good teacher, and, according to a colleague, his literary enthusiasm and high moral tone made him 'a missionary to the masters.' In 1847, when on a holiday tour in Scotland, he found Clough with a reading party in Inverness-shire, and it is believed that Philip in 'The Bothy of Tober-na-Vuolich' (then in progress) embodies characteristics of Shairp (Principal Shairp and his Friends, p. 110). In 1852 he was an unsuccessful candidate for the moral philosophy chair at Edinburgh. In 1856 he retired from Rugby to conduct for a time Professor Lushington's Greek classes at Glasgow, and in 1857 he was appointed assistant to Dr. Pyper, the Latin professor at St. Andrews. He succeeded Pyper on his death in 1861, and delivered a striking inaugural address on Latin literature. As a professor he was earnest and stimulating, never overlooking the importance of sound scholarship, but grappling also with the thought of his author, and expounding comparative literature. He advocated a higher standard for entrants to the universities, and warmly encouraged a residential college hall at St. Andrews, which, however, had only a brief existence. In 1868 Shairp succeeded James David Forbes as principal of the United College, St. Andrews, occupying the Latin chair at the same time till 1872. He was a vigorous head, and interested himself in university extension, specially favouring a union of interests between St. Andrews and Dundee. In 1872 he built near Aberfeldy, Perthshire, a villa which he named Cull-Aluinn (bonnie nook).

In June 1877 Shairp succeeded Sir Francis Hastings Charles Doyle as professor of poetry at Oxford, delivering his first lecture ('On the Province of Poetry') in the following Michaelmas term. Although he was somewhat out of sympathy with the prevalent taste of the university, he made an impression by his manifest sincerity. He was reappointed, according to usage, in 1882. In 1884 the degree of LL.D. was conferred on him at the tercentenary celebration of Edinburgh University. Owing to failing health at the end of this year, he spent several months in the north of Italy. He died, while on a visit to Ormsary, Argyllshire, on 18 Sept. 1886. He was buried in the Houstoun vault, within the church of his native parish. Memorial windows in the chapel of St. Salvator's College, St. Andrews, and the Balliol library, Oxford, chronicle his connection with the two universities. A characteristic portrait, by Robert Herdman, R.S.A., hangs in the hall of the United College, St. Andrews.

On 23 June 1853 Shairp married Eliza Douglas, daughter of Henry Alexander Douglas, and granddaughter of Sir William Douglas, bart., of Kilhead, Dumfriesshire. The death of their first son in the spring of 1855 prompted some graceful and pathetic verses. Shairp was survived by his wife and one son, Mr. Campbell Shairp, advocate, who became sheriff-substitute of Argyllshire.

From his youth Shairp was a writer, but he did not publish early. In 1856 he issued a vigorous pamphlet on 'The Wants of Scottish Universities and some of the Remedies.' After settling at St. Andrews, he contributed frequently to periodicals. In 1864 he published 'Kilmahoe: a Highland Pastoral, and other Poems,' in which he revealed his love of nature and of Scottish scenes and interests, and displayed a strong and original, if somewhat irregular, lyrical gift. Among the miscellaneous pieces in the volume, the tender and haunting 'Bush aboon Traquair' easily won and retained popularity. 'Studies in Poetry and Philosophy' appeared in 1868 (4th edit. 1886). It comprises essays on Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Keble, displaying the author's critical and expository powers at their best, and a suggestive article on 'The Moral Motive power.' 'Culture and Religion,' which was published in 1870 and speedily went into several editions, skilfully elaborates the thesis that man's spiritual nature must be postulated in any adequate philosophy of life. In 1873 Shairp collaborated, with Professor Tait, in the 'Life and Letters of J. D. Forbes,' and in 1874 he edited, with knowledge and enthusiasm, Dorothy Wordsworth's 'Journal.' In 1877 he published 'Poetic Interpretation of Nature,' a careful delineation of a congenial theme. In 1879 appeared his monograph on Burns in the series 'English Men of Letters.' Outspoken and uncompromising in its treatment of the man, the work is sane and convincing in its criticism of the poet. The Oxford lectures, dealing with poetry and various poets, from Burns to Cardinal Newman, were published in 1881 as 'Aspects of Poetry.' Professor Veitch collected in a volume in 1887 a number of articles by Shairp, under the title 'Sketches in History and Poetry.' In 1888 Mr. Francis Turner Palgrave edited 'Glen Dessaray, and other Poems,' a collection which includes, besides the Jacobite title-piece, various effective lyrics, such as 'The Mountain Walk' and 'The Wilderness,' and the memorial poem 'Balliol Scholars.' Shairp's sketches of departed friends are invariably charged with fine feeling. He paid tributes, in biographies or prefatory introductions, to (among others) Norman Macleod, Clough, Professor Ferrier, Dean Stanley, and Erskine of Linlathen.

[Professor Knight's Principal Shairp and his Friends, Dean Boyle's Preface to Studies in Poetry and Philosophy, ed. 1886, and his article in the Guardian, 30 Sept. 1885; Merrie England, November 1885; Macleod's Memorials of John Mackintosh; Memoir of Norman Macleod, personal knowledge.] T. B.

SHAKERLEY, JEREMY (A. 1650), astronomer and mathematician, was author of 'The Anatomy of Urania Practica, or a short Mathematical Discourse; laying open the errors and impertinences delivered in a Treatise lately published by Mr. Vincent Wing and Mr. William Leybourne, under the title of Urania Practica,' London, 1649. Leybourne retorted in 'Ens fixum Shakerley, or the annihilation of Mr. Jeremie Shakerley,' 1649.

Shakerley's chief claim to distinction is as the second observer of the transit of Mercury. The first transit was observed in 1631 (OHAMBES, Astronomy, 1859, p. 341). According to Vincent Wing [q. v.] (Astronomia Britannica, London, 1669, p. 312), Shakerley foretold the transit of 1651 in a colloquy or disputation entitled 'De Mercurio in sole videndo.' No trace of this tract seems extant. Wing asserts that Shakerley went to India to observe the phenomenon, and that he made his observations by means of a telescope at Surat on the morning of 24 Oct. 1651.

While still absent, apparently in India, there appeared in London Shakerley's 'Tabulæ Britannicæ, the British Tables; wherein is contained Logistical Arithmetick, the Doctrine of the Sphere, astronomically chronologie, the ecclesiasticall accompt, the Equation and Reduction of Time, together with the Calculation of the Motions of the Fixed and Wandering Stars, and the Eclipses of the Luminaries. Calculated for the Meridian of London from the hypothesis of Bullialdus and the Observations of Mr. Horrox' (pp. 92 and tables), London, 1653, R. & W. Leybourn. Wallis wrote to Collins on 13 Feb. 1671-2, 'What Shakerley's tables are I know not; but Flamsteed, addressing the same correspondent on 13 Aug. 1672, seemed to be better informed. 'The precepts,' Flamsteed wrote, 'I found translated by the ingenious (sic) Mr. Shakerley, which I transcribed from him because I thought them clearer expressed than the English ones in Orabtree's letter, though they are in substance the very same' (RIGAUD, Corresp. of Scientific Men, ii. 167, 361).

[Authorities cited.]

H. F. B.

SHAKESPEAR, JOHN (1774-1858), orientalist, born at Lount, near Ashby, Leicestershire, in August 1774, was the son of a small farmer. He was educated at the parish school at Staunton Herald, and afterwards at a school kept by a clergyman, who brought him to the notice of Francis Rawdon-Hastings, lord Rawdon (afterwards Marquis of Hastings) [q. v.], the lord of the manor. Lord Rawdon, who was contemplating a mission to North Africa, sent Shakespear to learn Arabic in London, where he studied the language under Richardson and James Golius. In 1793 Lord Rawdon obtained for him a post in the commissariat of a force under his command, which it was proposed to send in aid of the insurgents in Brittany. About 1805 he was appointed to an oriental professorship at the Royal Military College, Marlow. When the East India Company, in 1809, opened a training college for cadets at Addiscombe, he was appointed professor of Hindustani there on 200*l.* a year, his salary rising in 1811 to 400*l.* and in 1822 to 600*l.* While at Addiscombe he compiled a Hindustani grammar and dictionary, and various text-books. Of the first edition of his dictionary he said that it was little more than a revision of one published in Calcutta by Dr. William Hunter, who died at Java in 1812: but subsequent editions contained the results of his own researches. In 1829 he retired from the East India Company's service with a pension of 300*l.* a year. Being a man of singularly frugal and self-denying habits, he put by a considerable proportion of his salary as a professor, in addition to which he made large sums by the sale of his books. He was thus enabled on his retirement to purchase Langley Priory in Leicestershire, thereby fulfilling, it was said, the ambition of his boyhood (VIBART, Addiscombe).

In 1856 he gave 2,500*l.* to the trustees of the fund for preserving William Shakespear's house at Stratford-on-Avon, this munificent offer being prompted apparently by the idea that he might have been descended from a branch of the dramatist's family. In his will he bequeathed a further sum to the fund (Athenæum, 1856, ii. 85); but the court of chancery pronounced the bequest invalid. He died at Langley Priory on 10 June 1858 unmarried, the estate passing to his nephew, Charles Bowles, who took the surname of Shakespear.

There is a portrait by H. P. Briggs, painted in 1835, and two others by artists unnamed, all at Langley Priory.

He was author of: 1. 'Hindustani Grammar,' 1813; 6th edit. 1855. 2. 'Dictionary of Hindustani and English,' 1817; to the fourth edition of 1849 was added an English-Hindustani Dictionary. 3. 'Muntakhabat-i-Hindi, Selections in Hindustani,' 1817-18. 4. 'Introduction to the Hindustani Language,' 1845.

[Royal Asiatic Society's Journal, vol. xvii. old ser.; Vibart's Addiscombe; information supplied by Charles Shakespear, esq., J.P.]

S. W.

SHAKESPEAR, Sir RICHMOND CAMPBELL (1812-1861), soldier and administrator, youngest son of John Talbot Shakespear, of the Bengal civil service, by Emily (eldest daughter of William Makepeace Thackeray of the Bengal civil service and his wife, Amelia Richmond Webb), was born in India on 11 May 1812. He came to England with his first cousin, William Makepeace Thackeray [q. v.], and was with him at a preparatory school, 'governed,' says Thackeray, 'by a horrible little tyrant.' Both boys afterwards passed to the Charterhouse school. In Colonel Newcome, Thackeray embodied some traits in the character of Richmond's eldest brother, Colonel John Dowdeswell Shakespear. Shakespear entered the military college of the East India Company at Addiscombe in 1827, obtaining a commission as second lieutenant in the Bengal artillery on 12 June 1828. He arrived in India on 10 Feb. 1829, and served at various stations in Bengal until 19 Jan. 1837, when he was appointed assistant in the revenue department and stationed at Gorakhpur.

On 26 Sept. 1838, having returned to military duty, he joined at Delhi the 6th light field (camel) battery of nine-pounders under the command of Captain Augustus Abbott, and, leaving Delhi on 4 Nov., marched in the army of the Indus under Major-general Sir Willoughby Cotton and Lieutenant-general Sir John (afterwards Lord) Keane, to the Indus, and on through the Bolan pass to Kandahar, where he arrived in April 1839. He took part in the expedition to Girishk under Sir Robert Henry Sale [q. v.] against the Kandahar chiefs, returning to Kandahar on 29 May.

On 21 June he was appointed political assistant in the mission to Herat of Major d'Arcy Todd [q. v.], the newly appointed envoy to Shah Kamran. Shakespear's special duty was to instruct the soldiery of Herat in gunnery and drill. On the advance of the Russians on Khiva, Todd sent Shakespear to the khan of Khiva to aid in the negotiation for the surrender of the Russian captives, whose detention had led to the Russian advance. Shakespear left Herat with an escort on 14 May 1840, reached Merv (265 miles) on 23 May, and Khiva, 433 miles further, on 12 June. He induced the khan to make a treaty with the Russian general, who was within three days' march of his capital. The prominent conditions of the treaty were that the Russian forces should withdraw within Russian territory, and that the Khivans should restore all Russian captives who had been taken into slavery by them. Shakespear undertook to collect all Russian captives within the Khivan dominions, and march them in safety to Russia. By 14 Aug. he succeeded in collecting 416 captives, believed to be all that there were. He carried them successfully across the Turkestan desert in defiance of the wild tribes by which it was infested, and on 1 Oct. delivered the grateful captives to the Russian authorities of Orenburg. From Orenburg he posted to Moscow by way of Lankensark, and continued his journey by diligence to St. Petersburg, where he arrived on 3 Nov. He was much fêted and was cordially received by the czar. From St. Petersburg Shakespear carried despatches to London. On 31 Aug. 1841 he was knighted by the queen. He contributed to 'Blackwood's Magazine,' June 1842, a paper entitled 'A Journey from Herat to Orenburg,' which was republished by Blackwood in the series of 'Travel, Adventure, and Sport.'

Shakespear returned to India the same year. On 3 Jan. 1842 he was appointed military secretary to Major-general (afterwards Field-marshal Sir) George Pollock [q. v.], commanding the force assembled at Peshawar for the relief of Sir Robert Sale at Jalalabad. He reached Peshawar on 5 Feb., and remained there for two months while the column was organised and reinforcements were brought up. On 31 March he accompanied Pollock to Jamrud, and on 5 April entered the Khaibar pass. He volunteered to accompany Lieutenant-colonel Taylor as his aide-de-camp in his attack on the heights on the right, and took command of the men lately comprising the garrison of Ali-Masjid. In his despatch Pollock mentioned that Shakespear's exertions throughout the day were conspicuous and unceasing (London Gazette, 7 June 1842). He again distinguished himself at Mamu Khel on 24 Aug., at Jagdalak on 8 Sept. and at Tezin on 12 and 18 Sept. On each occasion he was mentioned by Pollock in despatches. On arrival at Kabul on 15 Sept. he volunteered to accompany six hundred Kazibach horsemen to rescue the British captives detained by the Afghans at Bamian. The captives, by the exertions of Eldred Pottinger [q. v.] and by liberal bribery, had already effected their own release, but Shakespear, meeting them on the 17th at the foot of the Kalu pass, was of assistance in escorting them through the disturbed country until, on the 20th, they met Sir Robert Sale coming up in support with a brigade. Shakespear arrived at Kabul with the captives on 22 Sept. (i.e. 6 Dec. 1842). On 12 Oct. he accompanied Pollock on his return march to India. Meeting with little opposition, he reached Peshawar on 12 Nov. and crossed the Satlaj by the bridge of boats at Firozpur on 19 Dec., when the army was received by the viceroy and commander-in-chief with every demonstration of honour. Shakespear received the war medal with clasp for Kabul.

On 28 March 1843 Shakespear was appointed deputy commissioner of Sagar. He was promoted to be brevet captain on 12 June of the same year. In October he was transferred to Gwalior as assistant to Lieutenant-colonel Sleeman, political agent for affairs in Scindia's dominions, and took part in the war against the Mahratta forces, which was needed to establish the government at Gwalior on a firm foundation. He was aide-de-camp to Sir Hugh (afterwards Lord) Gough at the battle of Maharajpur on 29 Dec. 1843, and received the best thanks of the commander-in-chief of the army in his despatch of 4 Jan. 1844 (i.e. 8 March 1845), as well as the war medal. After this he was employed in getting possession of Gwalior fort and in disbanding the Darbar troops. On return to civil duties he remained in political charge of Gwalior until June 1848. During this time it was not found necessary to employ the contingent on active service. On 1 May 1846 he was promoted to be regimental captain.

In 1848 sickness compelled Shakespear to go to the hills on leave; but, on the outbreak of the second Sikh war, he returned to military duty on 20 Oct. Joining at Firozpur the army of the Panjab, under Sir Hugh Gough, he was present at the action of Ramnagar on 22 Nov. On 1 Dec. he received promotion to a brevet majority for his previous services. On 8 Dec. he was in the action of Sadulapur or passage of the Chenab, and on 13 Jan. 1849 he commanded his battery of six heavy guns at the battle of Chillianwalla, and was mentioned in despatches (i.e. 3 and 7 March 1849). At the battle of Gujerat on 21 Feb. 1849, Shakespear again commanded his heavy-gun battery. The battle opened with a three hours' artillery cannonade by the British at a range of 1,500 yards and at the rate of forty rounds per gun per hour. Lord Gough pronounced this cannonade to be the most magnificent he had ever witnessed and terrible in its effects. After the cannonade the artillery advanced with extraordinary celerity, taking up successive forward positions and steadily driving the enemy back. Shakespear was wounded, and was obliged to return to the hills upon sick certificate. He was thanked in despatches for his exertions (i.e. 19 April 1849). He received the war medal with two clasps, one for Chillianwalla and the other for Gujerat, and on 7 June he was promoted to be brevet lieutenant-colonel for his services.

Shakespear returned to civil employment at Gwalior towards the end of 1849. In 1851 he was transferred to the political agency at Jodpur. He was gazetted to be resident at Nipal in 1853, but did not take up the appointment, as it did not actually become vacant. He was promoted to be brevet colonel in the army on 28 Nov. 1854. In 1857 he was appointed resident at Baroda, and, in February 1858, political commissioner of the district, and received acting command of the northern division of the Bombay army, in addition to his political duties, with the rank of brigadier-general. He was promoted to be regimental lieutenant-colonel on 27 Aug. 1858.

In July 1859 Shakespear became agent to the governor-general for Central India, residing at Indur. He conducted that year the negotiations with the Begums of Bhopal and installed Sikander Begum as rani of Bhopal. For his tact in extricating the government from an embarrassing position, he was highly commended by the governor-general in council in a despatch dated 31 Dec. He was made a companion of the Bath, civil division, in 1860, and later in the same year (30 Dec.) Lord Canning, in a despatch to the home government, expressed his high appreciation of Shakespear's conduct of the negotiations with Scindia. Scindia had been induced to concede territory to the maharaja of Gwalior in acknowledgment of the latter's services to the government during the mutiny. Scindia also consented to receive a subsidiary force composed of troops of the line in lieu of the contingent. Shakespear had accepted the post of chief commissioner of Maieur and Kurg, and was preparing to take up the appointment, when he died of bronchitis at Indur on 29 Oct. 1861.

In 1841, when Shakespear was knighted, the only occasion during his whole service on which he visited England, he met his cousin, William Makepeace Thackeray, who, on the announcement of Shakespear's death, paid, in 'Roundabout Papers' ('Letts's Diary'), a tribute to his memory and referred to this meeting. 'His kind hand,' wrote Thackeray, 'was always open. It was a gracious fate which sent him to rescue widows and captives. Where could they have had a champion more chivalrous, a protector more loving and tender?'

Shakespear married at Agra, India, on 5 March 1844, Marian Sophia, third daughter of George Powney Thompson, of the Bengal civil service, by Harriet, second daughter of John Fendall, governor of Java at the time of its restoration to the Dutch. Lady Shakespear and a family of three sons and six daughters survived him.

A sketch of Shakespear made by Prince Soltykoff when on a visit to the Gwalior residency was afterwards lithographed. There is in Lady Shakespear's possession a fine crayon portrait in colour of her husband, by Henry Fanner.

[Despatches; India Office Records; War Office Records, Vibart's Addiscombe: its Heroes and Men of Note, 1894; Lady Sale's Journal of the Disasters in Afghanistan, 1843; Kaye's Lives of Indian Officers, 1867, vol. ii.; Stocqueler's Memorials of Afghanistan, 1843; Eyre's Military Operations at Cabul, with a Journal of Imprisonment in Afghanistan, 1843; Thackeray's Roundabout Papers; Sir William Hunter's Thackerays in India, 1897, pp. 147 sq.; Low's Life of Field Marshal Sir George Pollock, 1873; Kaye's History of the War in Afghanistan; Low's Journal and Correspondence of the late Major-General Augustus Abbott, 1879; Abbott's Khiva, 1866; Ann. Register, 1861; Times, 6 and 12 Dec. 1861; private sources.] R. H. V.

SHAKESPEARE, WILLIAM (1564-1616), dramatist and poet, came of a family whose surname was borne through the middle ages by residents in very many parts of England—at Penrith in Cumberland, at Kirkland and Doncaster in Yorkshire, as well as in nearly all the midland counties. The surname had originally a martial significance, implying capacity in the wielding of the spear (OAMDDN, Remains, ed. 1605, p. 111; VNSTEGAN, Restitution, 1605). Its first recorded holder is John Shakespear, who in 1279 was living at 'Freyndon,' perhaps Frittenden, Kent (Plac. Cor. 7 Edw. I, Kane.; cf. Notes and Queries, 1st ser. xi. 122). The great mediæval guild of St. Anne at Knowle, whose members included the leading inhabitants of Warwickshire, was joined by many Shakespeares in the fifteenth century (cf. Reg. ed. Bickley, 1894). In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the surname is found far more frequently in Warwickshire than elsewhere. The archives of no less than twenty-four towns and villages there contain notices of Shakespeare families in the sixteenth century, and as many as thirty-four Warwickshire towns or villages were inhabited by Shakespeare families in the seventeenth century. Among them all William was a common christian name. At Rowington, twelve miles to the north of Stratford, and in the same hundred of Barlichway, one of the most prolific Shakespeare families of Warwickshire resided in the sixteenth century, and no less than three Richard Shakespeares of Rowington, whose extant wills were proved respectively in 1580, 1591, and 1614, were fathers of sons called William. At least one other William Shakespeare was during the period a resident in Rowington. As a consequence, the poet has been more than once credited with achievements which rightly belong to one or other of his numerous contemporaries who were identically named.

The poet's ancestry cannot be traced with certainty beyond his grandfather. The poet's father, when applying for a grant of arms in 1596, claimed that his grandfather and the poet's great-grandfather received for services rendered in war a grant of land in Warwickshire from Henry VII. No precise confirmation of this pretension has been discovered, and it may be, after the manner of heraldic genealogy, fictitious. But the poet undoubtedly came of good yeoman stock, and there is every probability that his ancestors to the fourth or fifth generation were fairly substantial landowners (cf. Times, 14 Oct. 1895; Notes and Queries, 8th ser. viii. 501; Genealog. Mag. May 1897). Adam Shakespeare, a tenant by military service of land at Baddeley Clinton in 1389, was great-grandfather of one Richard Shakespeare, who held land at Wroxhall in Warwickshire in 1526. The latter is hesitatingly conjectured to have migrated soon after that date to Snitterfield, a village four miles to the north of Stratford-on-Avon. At Snitterfield a yeoman of the name was settled in 1535 (cf. HALLIWELL-PHILLIPPS, ii. 207), and there is no doubt that he was the poet's grandfather. In 1550 he was renting a messuage and land at Snitterfield of Robert Arden; he was alive in 1560, and may be assumed to have died before the opening of the next year, when the Snitterfield parish registers, in which no mention is made of him, came into being. Richard of Snitterfield had at least two sons, Henry and John; the parentage of a Thomas Shakespeare, a considerable landholder at Snitterfield between 1563 and 1583, is undetermined, but he may have been a third son. The son Henry remained at Snitter-field all his life, and died a prosperous farmer in December 1596. John, the younger son of Richard, was the poet's father.

The poet's ancestry.

About 1551 John Shakespeare left Snitterfield, which was probably his birthplace, for the neighbouring borough of Stratford-on-Avon. There he set up as a trader in all manner of agricultural produce. Corn, wool, malt, meat, skins, and leather were soon among the commodities in which he dealt. Contemporary documents often describe him as a glover. Aubrey, Shakespeare's first biographer, reported the tradition that he was a butcher. But though both designations doubtless indicated important branches of his business, neither can be regarded as disclosing its full extent. In April 1552 he was living in Henley Street, a thoroughfare leading to the market town of Henley-in-Arden, and he is first mentioned in the borough records as paying in that month a fine of twelve-pence for having a dirt-heap in front of his house. His frequent appearances in the years that follow as either plaintiff or defendant in suits heard in the local court of record for the recovery of small debts suggest that he was a keen man of business. In early life he prospered in trade, and in October 1556 purchased two freehold tenements at Stratford—one in Henley Street with a garden (it adjoins that now known as the poet's birthplace), and the other in Greenhill Street with a garden and croft. Thenceforth he played a prominent part in municipal affairs. In 1557 he was elected an ale-taster, whose duty it was to test the quality of malt liquore and bread. About the same time he was elected a Burgess or town councillor, and in September 1558, and again on 6 Oct. 1559, he was appointed one of the four petty constables by a vote of the jury of the court-leet. Twice—in 1559 and 1561—he was chosen one of the assessors—officers appointed to determine the fines for those offences which were punishable arbitrarily, and for which no express penalties were prescribed by statute. In 1561 he was elected one of the two chamberlains of the borough, an office of responsibility which he held for two years. He delivered his second statement of account to the corporation in January 1564. When attesting documents he made his mark, and there is no evidence that he could write; but he was credited with financial aptitude. The municipal accounts, which were checked by tallies and counters, were audited by him after he ceased to be chamberlain, and he more than once advanced small sums of money to the corporation.

With characteristic shrewdness he chose a wife of assured fortune—Mary, youngest daughter of Robert Arden, a wealthy farmer of Wilmcote in the parish of Aston Cantlowe, near Stratford. The Arden family in its eldest branch ranked among the most influential of the county. Robert's great-grandfather has been identified with Robert Arden (d. 1452), who was sheriff of Warwickshire and Leicestershire in 1438 (16 Hen. VI), and the latter's descendant, Edward Arden [q. v.], who was high sheriff of Warwickshire in 1575, was executed in 1583 for alleged complicity in a Roman catholic plot against the life of Queen Elizabeth (FRENCH, Genealogia Shakespeareana, pp. 468 seq.) John Shakespeare's wife belonged to a younger branch of the family (ib. pp. 465 seq.) Her grandfather, Thomas Arden, purchased in 1501 an estate at Snitterfield, which passed, with other property, to her father Robert, and John Shakespeare's father, Richard, was one of Robert Arden's Snitterfield tenants. By his first wife, whose name is not known, Robert Arden had seven daughters, of whom all but two married; John Shakespeare's wife seems to have been the youngest. Robert Arden's second wife, Agnes or Anne, widow of John Hill (d. 1545), a substantial farmer of Bearley, survived him; but by her he had no issue. When he died at the end of 1550 he owned a farmhouse at Wilmcote and many acres of land, besides some hundred acres of land at Snitterfield, with two farmhouses which he let out to tenants. The post-mortem inventory of his goods, which was made on 9 Dec. 1556, shows that he had lived in comfort; his house was adorned by as many as eleven 'painted cloths,' which then did duty for tapestries among the middle classes. The exordium of his will, which was drawn up on 24 Nov. 1556, and proved on 18 Dec. following, indicates that he was an observant catholic. For his two youngest daughters, Alice and Mary, he showed especial affection by nominating them his executors. Mary received not only 6*l.* 1*8s.* 4*d.* in money, but the fee-simple of Ashbie, his chief property at Wilmcote, which consisted of a house with some fifty acres of land. She also acquired, under an earlier settlement, an interest in two messuages at Snitterfield (HALLWELL-PHILLIPPS, ii. 179). But however well she was provided for, she was only able, like her husband, to make her mark in lieu of signing her name.

John Shakespeare's marriage with Mary Arden doubtless took place at Aston Cantlowe, the parish church of Wilmcote, in the autumn of 1557 (the church registers begin at a later date). On 15 Sept. 1558 his first child, a daughter, Joan, was baptised in the church of Stratford. A second child, another daughter, Margaret, was baptised on 2 Dec. 1562; but both these children died in infancy. The poet William, the firstson and third child, was born on 22 or 23 April 1564. The poet's birth and baptism. The latter date is generally accepted as his birthday, mainly (it would appear) on the ground that it was the day of his death. There is no positive evidence on the subject, but the Stratford parish registers attest that he was baptised on 26 April.

Some doubt is justifiable as to the ordinarily accepted scene of his birth. Of two adjoining houses forming a detached building on the north side of Henley Street, that to the east was purchased by John Shakespeare in 1556, but there is no evidence that he owned or occupied the house to the west before 1575. Yet this western house has been known since 1759 as the poet's birthplace, and a room on the first floor is claimed as that in which he was born (cf. HALLIWELL-PHILLIPS, Letter to Elze, 1888). The two houses subsequently came by bequest of the poet's granddaughter to the family of the poet's sister, Joan Hart, and while the eastern tenement was let out to strangers for more than two centuries, and by them converted into an inn, the so-called birthplace was until 1806 occupied by the Harte, who latterly carried on there the trade of butcher. The fact of its long occupancy by the poet's collateral descendants accounts for the identification of the western rather than the eastern tenement with his birthplace. Both houses were purchased in behalf of subscribers to a public fund in 1846, and, after extensive restoration, were converted into a single domicile for the purposes of a public museum. They were presented under a deed of trust to the corporation of Stratford in 1806. Much of the Elizabethan timber and stone work survives, but a cellar under the so-called birthplace is the only portion which remains as it was at the date of the poet's birth (cf. documents and sketches in HALLIWELL-PHILLIPS, i. 377-94).

In July 1564, when William was three months old, the plague raged with unwonted vehemence at Stratford, and his father liberally contributed to the relief of its poverty-stricken victims. Fortune still favoured him. On 4 July 1565 he reached the dignity of an alderman. From 1567 onwards he was accorded in the corporation archives the honourable prefix of 'Mr.' At Michaelmas 1568 he attained the highest office in the corporation gift, that of bailiff, and during his year of office the corporation for the first time entertained actors at Stratford. The queen's company and the Earl of Worcester's company each received from John Shakespeare an official welcome. On 5 Sept. 1571 he was chief alderman, a post which he retained till 8 Sept. of the following year. In 1573 Alexander Webbe, the husband of his wife's sister Agnes, made him overseer of his will; in 1575 he bought two houses in Stratford, one of them doubtless the alleged birthplace in Henley Street; in 1576 he contributed twelve pence to the beadle's salary. But after Michaelmas 1572 he took a less active part in municipal affairs: he grew irregular in his attendance at the council meetings, and signs were soon apparent that his luck had turned. In 1578 he was unable to pay, with his colleagues, either the sum of fourpence for the relief of the poor, or his contribution 'towards the furniture of three pikemen, two bellmen, and one archer,' who were sent by the corporation to attend a muster of the trained bands of the county. Meanwhile his family was increasing. A daughter Ann (bapt. 28 Sept. 1571) was buried on 4 April 1579; but four children beside.

Brothers and sisters. the poet—three sons, Gilbert (bapt. 13 Oct. 1566), Richard (bapt. 11 March 1574), and Edmund (bapt. 3 May 1580), with a daughter Joan (bapt. 15 April 1569)—reached maturity. To meet his growing liabilities, the father borrowed money from his wife's kinsfolk, and he and his wife mortgaged, on 14 Nov. 1578, Asbies, her valuable property at Wilmcote, for 40*l.* to Edmund Lambert of Barton-on-the-Heath, who had married her sister, Joan Arden. Lambert was to receive no interest on his loan, but was to take the 'rents and profits' of the estate. Asbies was thereby alienated for ever. Next year, on 15 Oct. 1579, John and his wife made over to Robert Webbe, doubtless a relative of Alexander Webbe, for the sum of 4*l.*, his wife's property at Snitterfield (HALLIWELL-PHILLIPS, ii. 407-8). John Shakespeare obviously chafed under the humiliation of having parted, although as financial difficulties. he hoped only temporarily, with his wife's property of Asbies, and in the autumn of 1580 offered to pay off the mortgage; but his brother-in-law, Lambert, retorted that other sums were owing, and he would accept all or none. The negotiation, which proved the beginning of much litigation, thus proved abortive. Through 1585 and 1586 a creditor, John Brown, was embarrassingly importunate, and, after obtaining a writ of distrain, Brown informed the local court that the debtor had nothing on which distraint could be levied (ib. ii. 238). On 6 Sept. 1586 John was deprived of his alderman's gown, on the ground of his long absence from the council meetings.

Happily John Shakespeare was at no expense for the education of his four sons.

They were entitled to free tuition at the free grammar school of Stratford, which was reconstituted on a mediæval foundation by Edward VI. The eldest son, William, probably entered the school in 1571, when Walter Roche was master, and perhaps he knew something of Thomas Hunt, who succeeded Roche in 1577. The instruction that he received was mainly confined to the Latin language and literature. From the Latin accidence, boys of the period, at schools of the type of that at Stratford, were led, through conversation books like the 'Sententiæ Pueriles' and Lily's grammar, to the perusal of such authors as Seneca, Terence, Cicero, Virgil, Plautus, Ovid, and Horace. The eclogues of the popular mediæval poet, Mantuanus, were often preferred to Virgil's for beginners. The rudiments of Greek were occasionally taught in Elizabethan grammar schools to very promising pupils; but such coincidences as have been detected between expressions in Greek plays and those in Shakespeare's plays seem due to accident, and not to any study by Shakespeare while at school or elsewhere of the Athenian drama. With the Latin language and with many Latin poets of the school curriculum, on the other hand, Shakespeare openly acknowledged his acquaintance.

In the mouth of his schoolmasters, Holofernes in 'Love's Labour's Lost' and Sir Hugh Evans in 'Merry Wives of Windsor,' he placed phrases drawn directly from Lily's grammar, from the 'Sententiæ Pueriles,' and from 'the good old Mantuan'; Plautus was the source of his 'Comedy of Errors,' and the influence of Ovid, especially the 'Metamorphoses,' was apparent throughout his earliest literary work, both poetic and dramatic. In the Bodleian Library is a copy of the Aldine edition of Ovid's 'Metamorphoses' (1502), and on the title is the signature 'W<sup>m</sup>. Sh<sup>e</sup>.', which experts have declared—not quite conclusively—to be a genuine autograph of the poet (MACRAX, Annals of the Bodleian, 1890, pp. 379 seq.) Dr. Farmer enunciated in his 'Essay on Shakespeare's Learning' (1767) the theory that Shakespeare knew no language but his own, and owed whatever knowledge he displayed of the classics and of Italian and French literature to English translations. But by no means all the books in French and Italian whence Shakespeare is positively known to have derived the plots of his dramas—Belleforest's 'Histoires Tragiques' and Cinthio's 'Hecatommithi,' for example—were accessible to him in English translations; and on more general grounds the theory of his ignorance is adequately confuted. A boy with Shakespeare's exceptional alertness of intellect, during whose schoolday—a training in the Latin classics lay within reach, could hardly lack in future years all means of access to the literature of Rome, France, and modern Italy. He had no title to rank as a classical scholar, and his lack of exact scholarship fully accounts for the 'small Latin and less Greek' with which he was credited by his scholarly friend, Ben Jonson. But Aubrey's report that 'his understood Latin pretty well' cannot be reasonably contested (cf. SPENCER BAYNES, 'What Shakespeare learnt at School' in Shakespeare Studies, 1894, pp. 147 seq.)

His father's financial difficulties doubtless caused Shakespeare's removal from school at an unusually early age. Probably in 1577, when he was thirteen, he was enlisted by his father in an effort to restore his decaying fortunes. 'I have been told heretofore,' wrote Aubrey, 'by some of the neighbours that when he was a boy he exercised his father's trade,' which, according to the writer, was that of a butcher. It is possible that John's ill-luck at the period compelled him to confine himself to this occupation, which in happier days formed only one branch of his business. His son may have been formally apprenticed to him. An early Stratford tradition describes him as 'a butcher's apprentice' (DOWDALL). 'When he kill'd a calf,' Aubrey proceeds less convincingly, 'he would doe it in a high style and make a speech. There was at that time another butcher's son in this towne, that was held not at all inferior to him for a naturall witt, his acquaintance, and coetanean, but dyed young.'

At the end of 1582 Shakespeare, when little more than eighteen and a half years old, took a step which was little calculated to lighten his father's anxieties. He married. His wife, according to the inscription on her tombstone, was his senior by eight years. Rowe states that she 'was the daughter of one Hathaway, said to have been a substantial yeoman in the neighbourhood of Stratford.'

On 1 Sept. 1581 Richard Hathaway, 'husbandman' of Shotton, a hamlet in the parish of Old Stratford, made his will, which was proved on 9 July 1582, and is preserved in the prerogative court of Canterbury. His house and land, 'two and a half virgates,' had been long held in copyhold by his family, and he died in fairly prosperous circumstances. His wife Joan, the chief legatee, was directed to carry on the farm with the aid of her eldest son, Bartholomew, to whom a share in its proceeds was assigned. Six other children—three sons and three daughters—received sums of money; Agnes, the eldest daughter, and Catherine, the second daughter, were each allotted 6*l.* 1*8s.* 4*d.*, 'to be paid at the day of her marriage,' a phrase common in wills of the period. Anne Hathaway. Anne and Agnes were in the sixteenth century alternative spellings of the same christian name; and there is little doubt that the daughter 'Agnes' of Richard Hathaway's will became, within a few months of his death, Shakespeare's wife.

The poet's classical equipment.

The poet's marriage.

The house at Shottery, now known as Anne Hathaway's cottage, and reached from Stratford by field-paths, undoubtedly once formed part of Richard Hathaway's farmhouse, and, despite numerous alterations and renovations, still preserves many features of a thatched farmhouse of the Elizabethan period. The house remained in the Hathaway family till 1838, although the male line became extinct in 1746. It was purchased in behalf of the public by the Birthplace trustees in 1892.

No record of Shakespeare's marriage survives. Although the parish of Stratford included Shottery, and thus both bride and bridegroom were parishioners, the Stratford parish register is silent on the subject. A baseless tradition assigns the ceremony to the village of Luddington, of which neither the church nor parish registers exist. But in the registry of the bishop of the diocese (Worcester) a deed is extant by which Fulk Sandells and John Richardson, 'husbandmen of Stratford,' bound themselves in the bishop's consistory court, on 28 Nov. 1582, in sureties of 40*l.* each, to disclose any lawful impediment—'by reason of any precontract' [i.e. with a third party] or consanguinity—to the marriage of William Shakespeare with Anne Hathaway. In the absence of such impediment (the deed continued), and provided that Anne obtained the consent of her friends, the marriage might proceed 'with once asking of the bannes of matrimony betwene them.' The effect of the deed would be to expedite the ceremony, while protecting the clergy from the consequences of any possible breach of canonical law. The two sureties, Sandells and Richardson, were farmers of Shottery. Sandells was a 'supervisor' of the will of Anne's father, who there describes him as 'my trustie friende and neighbour.' He and Richardson, representing the lady's family, doubtless secured the deed on their own initiative, so that Shakespeare might have small opportunity of evading a step which his intimacy with their friends' daughter had rendered essential to her reputation. The wedding probably took place a few weeks after the signing of the deed. Within six months, in May 1583, a daughter was born to the poet, and was baptised in the name of Susanna at Stratford parish church on the 26th.

Shakespeare's apologists have endeavoured to show that the formal betrothal or 'troth-plight' which was at the time a common prelude to a wedding carried with it all the privileges of marriage. But neither Shakespeare's detailed description of a betrothal (Twelfth Night, act v. sc. i. ll. 160-4) nor his frequent notices of the solemn verbal contract that usually preceded marriage lend the contention much support (Measure for Measure, act i. sc. ii. l. 155, act iv. sc. i. l. 78); while the exceptional circumstance that the lady's friends alone were parties to the bond renders it improbable that Shakespeare had previously observed any of the more ordinary formalities.

A difficulty has been imported into the narration of the poet's matrimonial affairs by the assumption of his identity with one 'William Shakespeare,' to whom, according to an entry in the bishop of Worcester's register, a license was issued on 27 Nov. 1582 (the day before the signing of the Hathaway bond), authorising his marriage with Anne W hateley of Temple Grafton. The husband of Anne W hateley cannot reasonably be identified with the poet. He may well have been one of the numerous William Shakespeares who abounded in the parishes in the neighbourhood of Stratford. The theory that the maiden name of Shakespeare's wife was W hateley is quite untenable, and it is unsafe to assume that the bishop's clerk, when making out a license, erred so extensively as to write 'Anne W hateley of Temple Grafton' for 'Anne Hathaway of Shottery.' Had a license for the poet's marriage been secured on 27 Nov., it is unlikely that the Shottery husbandmen would have entered next day into a bond 'against impediments.'

Anne Hathaway's seniority and the likelihood that the poet was forced into marrying her by her friends were not circumstances of happy augury. Although it is dangerous to read into Shakespeare's dramatic utterances allusions to his personal experience, the emphasis with which he insists that a woman should take in marriage an 'elder than herself' (Twelfth Night, act ii. sc. iv. l. 29), and that prenuptial intimacy is productive of 'barren hate, sour-eyed disdain, and discord,' suggest a personal interpretation ('Tempest,' act iv. sc. i. ll. 15-22). To both these unpromising features was added, in the poet's case, the absence of a means of livelihood, and his course of life in the years that immediately followed implies that he bore his domestic ties with impatience. Early in 1585 twins were born to him, a son (Hamnet) and a daughter (Judith); both were baptised on 2 Feb. All the extant evidence points to the conclusion, which the fact that he had no more children confirms, that in the later months of the year (1585) he left Stratford, and that, although he was never wholly estranged from his family, he saw little of wife or children for eleven years. Between the winter of 1585 and the autumn of 1596—an interval which synchronises with his first literary triumphs—there is only one shadowy mention of his name in Stratford records. In April 1587 there died Edmund Lambert, who held Asbies under the mortgage of 1578, and a few months later Shakespeare's name, as owner of a contingent interest, was joined to that of his father and mother in a formal assent given to an abortive proposal to confer on Edmund's son and heir, John Lambert, an absolute title to the estate on condition of his cancelling the mortgage and paying 20%. But the deed does not indicate that Shakespeare personally assisted at the transaction (HALLIWELL-PHILLIPS, ii. 11-13).

Shakespeare's early literary work proves that while in the country he eagerly studied birds, flowers, and trees, and gained a detailed knowledge of horses and dogs. All his kinsfolk were farmers, and with them he doubtless as a youth practised many field-sports. Sympathetic references to hawking, hunting, coursing, and angling abound in his early plays and poems (cf. ELLACOMBE, Shakespeare as an Angler, 1883; J. E. HARTING, Ornithology of Shakespeare, 1872). But his sporting experiences passed at times beyond orthodox limits. A poaching adventure, according to a credible tradition, was the immediate cause of his long severance from his native place. 'He had,' wrote Rowe, 'by a misfortune common enough to young fellows, fallen into ill company, and, among them, some, that made a frequent practice of deer-stealing, engaged him with them more than once in robbing a park that belonged to Sir Thomas Lucy of

Poaching at Charlecote.

Charlecote near Stratford. For this he was prosecuted by that gentleman, as he thought, somewhat too severely; and, in order to revenge that ill-usage, he made a ballad upon him, and though this, probably the first essay of his poetry, be lost, yet it is said to have been so very bitter that it redoubled the prosecution against him to that degree that he was obliged to leave his business and family in Warwickshire and shelter himself in London.' The independent testimony of Archdeacon Davies, who was vicar of Saperton, Gloucestershire, late in the seventeenth century, is to the effect that Shakespeare 'was much given to all un-luckiness in stealing venison and rabbits, particularly from Sir Thomas Lucy, who had him oft whipt, and sometimes imprisoned, and at last made him fly his native county to his great advancement.' The law of Shakespeare's day (5 Eliz. cap. 21) punished deer-stealers with three months' imprisonment and the payment of thrice the amount of the damage done.

The tradition has been challenged on the ground that the Charlecote deer-park was of later date than the sixteenth century. But Sir Thomas Lucy was an extensive game-preserver, and owned at Charlecote a warren in which a few hares or does doubtless found an occasional home. Samuel Ireland [q. v.] was informed in 1794 that Shakespeare stole the deer, not from Charlecote, but from Fulbroke Park, a few miles off, and Ireland supplied in his 'Views on the Warwickshire Avon,' 1795, an engraving of an old farmhouse in the hamlet of Fulbroke, where he asserted Shakespeare was temporarily imprisoned after his arrest. An adjoining hovel was locally known for some years as Shakespeare's 'deer-barn,' but no portion of Fulbroke Park, which included the site of these buildings (now removed), was Lucy's property in Elizabeth's reign, and the amended legend, which was solemnly confided to Sir Walter Scott in 1828 by the owner of Charlecote, seems pure invention (cf. C. HOLZM BRACEBRIDEN, Shakespeare no Poacher, 1862; LOCKHART, Life of Scott, vii. 128).

The ballad which Shakespeare is reported to have fastened on the park gates of Charlecote does not, as Rowe acknowledged, survive. No authenticity can be allowed the worthless lines beginning 'A parliament member, a justice of peace,' which were represented to be Shakespeare's on the authority of an old man who lived near Stratford and died in 1703. But such an incident as the tradition reveals has left a distinct impress on Shakespearean drama. Justice

Justice Shallow.

Shallow is beyond doubt a reminiscence of the owner of Charlecote. According to Davies of Saperton, Shakespeare's 'revenge was so great that' he caricatured Lucy as 'Justice Clodpate,' who was (Davies adds) represented on the stage as 'a great man,' and as bearing, in allusion to Lucy's name, 'three louses rampant for his arms.' Justice Shallow, who came to birth in the 'Second Part of Henry IV,' is represented in the opening scene of the 'Merry Wives of Windsor' as having come from Gloucestershire to Windsor to make a Star-chamber matter of a poaching raid on his estate. The 'three lucres hauriant argent' were the arms borne by the Charlecote Lucys, and the dramatist's prolonged reference in this scene to the 'dozen white lucres' on Shallow's 'old coat' finally establishes Shallow's identity with Lucy.

The poaching episode is best assigned to 1586, but it may be questioned whether Shakespeare, on fleeing from Lucy's persecution, at once sought an asylum in London. William Beeston, a seventeenth-century actor, remembered hearing that he had been for a time a country schoolmaster 'in his younger years,' and it seems possible that on first leaving Stratford he found some such employment in a neighbouring village. The suggestion that he joined, at the end of 1586, some youths of the district in serving in the Low Countries under the Earl of Leicester, whose castle of Kenilworth was within easy reach of Stratford, is based on an obvious confusion between him and others of his name (cf. W. J. THOMAS, Three Notelets on Shakespeare, 1865, pp. 116 sq.). The knowledge of a soldier's life which Shakespeare exhibited in his plays is no greater and no less than that which he displayed of almost all other spheres of human activity, and to assume that he wrote of all or of any from practical experience, unless the evidence be conclusive, is to underrate his intuitive power of realising life in almost every aspect by force of his imagination.

To London Shakespeare naturally drifted, doubtless trudging thither on foot during 1586, by way of Oxford and High Wycombe (cf. HALES, Notes on Shakespeare, 1884, pp. 1-24). Tradition points to that as Shakespeare's favourite route, rather than to the road by Banbury and Aylesbury. Aubrey asserts that at Grendon, near Oxford, 'he happened to take the humour of the constable in "Midsummer Night's Dream"'—by which he meant, we may suppose, 'Much Ado about Nothing'—but there were watchmen of the Dogberry type all over England, and probably at Stratford itself. The Crown Inn (formerly 3 Cornmarket Street) near Carfax, at Oxford, was long pointed out as one of his resting-places.

To only one resident in London is Shakespeare likely to have been known previously. Richard Field, a native of Stratford, and son of a friend of Shakespeare's father, had left Stratford in 1579 to serve an apprenticeship with Thomas Vautrollier [q. v.], the London printer. Shakespeare and Field, who was made free of the Stationers' Company in 1587, were soon associated as author and publisher, but the theory that Field found work for Shakespeare in Vautrollier's printing-office is fanciful (BLAIR, Shakespeare and Typography). No more can be said for the attempt to prove that Shakespeare obtained employment as a lawyer's clerk. In view of his general quickness of apprehension, his accurate use of legal terms, which deserves all the attention that has been paid it, may be attributable in part to his observation of the many legal processes in which his father was involved, and in part to early intercourse with members of the inns of court (cf. LORD CAMPBELL, Shakespeare's Legal Acquirements, 1859; W. L. REESON, Shakespeare as a Lawyer, 1858, and Shakespeare's Testamentary Language, 1869).

Tradition and common-sense alike point to one of the only two theatres (The Theatre or The Curtain) that existed in London at the date of his arrival as an early scene of his regular occupation. The compiler of 'Lives of the Poets' (1753), assigned to Theophilus Cibber [q. v.], was the first to relate the story that his original connection with the playhouse was as holder of the horses of visitors outside the doors. According to the compiler, the story was related by D'Avenant to Betterton; but Rowe, to whom Betterton communicated it, made no use of it. The two regular theatres of the time were both reached on horseback by men of fashion, and the owner of the Theatre, James Burbage, kept a livery stable at Smithfield. There is no inherent improbability in the tale. Dr. Johnson's amplified version, in which Shakespeare was represented as organising a service of boys for the purpose of tending visitors' horses, sounds apocryphal.

There is every indication that Shakespeare was speedily offered employment inside the playhouse. In 1587 the two chief companies of actors, the queen's and Lord Leicester's, returned to London from a provincial tour, during which they visited Stratford. Two subordinate companies, who claimed the patronage of the Earl of Essex and Lord Stafford, also performed in the town during the same year. From such incidents doubtless sprang the opportunity which offered Shakespeare fame and fortune. According to Rowe's vague statement, 'he was received into the company then in being at first in a very mean rank.' William Castle, the parish clerk of Stratford at the end of the seventeenth century, was in the habit of telling visitors that he entered the playhouse as a servitor. Malone recorded in 1780 a stage tradition 'that his first office in the theatre was that of prompter's attendant' or call-boy. His intellectual capacity and the amiability with which he turned to account his versatile powers, were probably soon recognised, and thenceforth his promotion was assured.

The flight from Stratford.

The journey to London.

Theatrical employment.

Shakespeare's earliest reputation was made as an actor, and although his work as a dramatist soon eclipsed his histrionic fame, he remained a prominent member of the actor's profession till near the end of his life. In 1587 and following years, besides three companies of boy-actors formed from the choristers of St. Paul's Cathedral and the Chapel Royal and from Westminster scholars, there were at least six companies of adult London actors; five of these were called after noble patrons (the Earls of Leicester, Oxford, Sussex, and Worcester, and the lord admiral, Charles, lord Howard of Effingham), and one of them was called after the queen. Constant alterations of name, owing to the death or change from other causes of the patrons, render it difficult to trace with certainty each company's history. But there seems no doubt that the most influential of the companies named—that under the patronage of the Earl of Leicester—passed on his death in September 1588 under the patronage of Ferdinando Stanley, lord Strange, who became Earl of Derby on 25 Sept. 1592. When the Earl of Derby died on 16 April 1594, his place as patron was successively filled by Henry Carey, first lord Hunsdon, lord chamberlain (d. 23 July 1596), and by his son and heir, George Carey, second lord Hunsdon, who himself became lord chamberlain in March 1597. After King James's succession in May 1603 the company was promoted to be the king's players, and, thus advanced in dignity, it fully maintained the supremacy which, under successive titles, it had already long enjoyed.

It is fair to infer that this was the company that Shakespeare originally joined. Documentary evidence proves that he was a member of it in December 1594; in May 1603 he was one of its leaders. Four of its chief members—Richard Burbage [q. v.], the greatest tragic actor of the day, John Heming [q. v.], Henry Condell [q. v.], and Augustine Phillips—were among Shakespeare's lifelong friends. Under the same company's auspices, moreover, Shakespeare's plays first saw the light. Only two of the plays claimed for him, 'Titus Andronicus' and '3 Henry VI,' seem to have been performed by other companies (the Earl of Sussex's men in the one case and the Earl of Pembroke's in the other).

At first the company performed at the Theatre, but while known as Lord Strange's men, and when under the temporary management of the great actor, Edward Alleyn (of the Admiral's company), they opened on 19 Feb. 1592 a new theatre, called the Rose, which Philip Henslowe had erected on the Bankside, Southwark. The Rose was doubtless the earliest scene of Shakespeare's successes alike as actor and dramatist. Subsequently he frequented the older stage of the Curtain in Shoreditch. Early in 1599 Richard Burbage and his brother Cuthbert built on the Bankside a theatre called the Globe. It was octagonal in shape, and built of wood, and doubtless Shakespeare described it (rather than the Curtain) as 'this wooden O,' in the opening chorus of 'Henry V' (l. 18). After 1599 the Globe was mainly occupied by Shakespeare's company, and in its profits he acquired a share. The Blackfriars Theatre, which was created out of a dwelling-house by James Burbage [q. v.], the actor's father, at the end of 1596, was for many years afterwards leased out to the company of boy actors, known as 'the queen's children of the chapel;' it was not occupied by Shakespeare's company until December 1609 or January 1610, when his acting days were nearing their end.

In London Shakespeare resided near the theatres. According to a memorandum by Alleyn (which Malone quoted), he lodged in 1596 near 'the Bear Garden in Southwark.' In 1598 one William Shakespeare, who was assessed by the collectors of a subsidy in the sum of 13s. 4d. upon goods valued at 51., was a resident in St. Helen's parish, Bishopsgate, but it is not certain that this tax-payer was the dramatist (cf. Ecchequer Lay Subsidies City of London, 140/869, Public Record Office; Notes and Queries, 8th ser. viii. 418).

Elizabethan actors performed not only in London but in the provinces, and a few occasionally extended their professional tours to foreign courts. In Denmark, Germany, Austria, Holland, and possibly in France, many dramatic performances were given by English actors between 1580 and 1630 (cf. COHN, Shakespeare in Germany, 1865; MEISSNER, Die englischen Comödianten zur Zeit Shakespeare in Oesterreich, Vienna, 1884; JON STEFANSSON on 'Shakespeare at Elsinore' in Contemporary Review, January 1896; Notes and Queries, 5th ser. ix. 43, xi. 520). Shakespeare may be credited with faithfully fulfilling all his professional functions. The many references to travel in his sonnets were doubtless reminiscences of acting tours through English country towns, and it has been repeatedly urged that he visited Scotland with his company (cf. KNIGHT; FLEAY, Stage, pp. 135-6). In November 1599 English actors went to Scotland under the leadership of Lawrence Fletcher and one Martin. The former was a colleague of Shakespeare in 1603, but is not known to have been one earlier. Shakespeare's company never included an actor named Martin. Fletcher repeated the visit in October 1601 (MS. State Papers Dom. Scotland; P. R. O. vol. lkv. No. 64; FLEAY, Stage, pp. 126-44). There is nothing to indicate that any of his companions belonged to Shakespeare's company. That Shakespeare visited any part of the continent is even less probable. He repeatedly ridicules the craze for foreign travel (cf. As you like it, iv. i. 22-40). His name appears in no extant list of English actors who paid professional visits abroad.

Shakespeare's alleged travels.

To Italy, it is true, and especially in Italy. to the northern towns of Venice, Padua, Verona, Mantua, and Milan, he makes frequent and familiar reference, and he supplied many a realistic portrayal of Italian life and sentiment. But the fact that he represents Valentine in the 'Two Gentlemen of Verona' (i. i. 71) as travelling from Verona to Milan by sea, and Prospero in 'The Tempest' as embarking on a ship at the gates of Milan (i. ii. 129-44), renders it almost impossible that he could have gathered his knowledge of northern Italy from personal observation (cf. ELZE, Essays, 1874, pp. 254 seq.). He doubtless owed all to the verbal reports of travelled friends or to books, the contents of which he had a rare power of assimilating and vitalising.

Although the old actor William Beeston asserted that Shakespeare 'did act exceedingly well' (AUBREY), the rôles in which he distinguished himself are very imperfectly recorded. Few surviving documents directly refer to performances by him. At Christmas 1594 he joined the popular actors William Kemp, the chief comedian of the day, and Richard Burbage in 'two several comedies or interludes' which were acted on St. Stephen's day and on Innocents' day (27 and 28 Dec.) at Greenwich Palace before the queen. The three players received 'xiiiij. vjs. viiij. and by waye of her Majesties rewardes viij. xiiij. in all xli.' (HALLIWELL-PHILLIPS, i. 121; Jahrbuch d. deutschen Shakespeare-Gesellschaft, 1896, xxxii. 182 seq.) Neither plays nor parts are named. Shakespeare's name stands first on the list of those who took part in the original performances of Ben Jonson's 'Every Man in his Humour' (1598) and of his 'Sejanus' (1603), but the character allotted to each actor is not stated. Rowe identified only one of Shakespeare's parts, 'the Ghost in his own

'Hamlet,'" which Rowe asserted to be 'the top of his performance.' John Davies noted that he 'played some kingly parts in sport' (Scourge of Folly, 1610, epigr. 159). One of Shakespeare's younger brothers, assumably Gilbert, often came, wrote Oldys, to London in his younger days to see his brother act in his own plays, and in his old age, when his memory was failing, he recalled his brother's performance of Adam in 'As you like it.' In the 1623 folio edition of Shakespeare's 'Works' his name heads the prefatory list 'of the principall actors in all these playes.'

That Shakespeare chafed under some of the conditions of the actor's calling appears from the sonnets. He reproaches himself with making himself 'a motley to the view' (cx. 2), and chides fortune for having provided for his livelihood nothing better than 'public means that public manners breed,' whence his name received a brand (cxi. 4-5). His ambitions lay elsewhere, and at an early period of his theatrical career he was dividing his labours as an actor with those of a playwright.

The whole of Shakespeare's dramatic work was probably begun and ended within two decades (1591-1611), between Dramatic his twenty-seventh and forty work. seventh year. If, on the one hand, the works traditionally assigned to him include some contributions from other pens, he was perhaps responsible, on the other hand, for portions of a few plays that are traditionally claimed for others. When the account is balanced, Shakespeare must be credited with the production, during these twenty years, of an annual average of two plays, nearly all of which belong to the supreme rank of literature. Three volumes of poems must be added to the total. Ben Jonson was often told by the players that 'whatsoever he penned he never blotted out (i.e. erased) a line.' The editors of the first folio attested that 'what he thought he uttered with that easinesse that we have scarce received from him a blot in his papers.' Signs of hasty workmanship are not lacking, but they are few and unimportant when it is considered how rapidly his numerous compositions came from his pen.

By borrowing his plots he to some extent economised his energy, but he transformed most of them, and it was not His borrowed plots. probably with the object of conserving his strength that he systematically levied loans on popular current literature like Holinshed's 'Chronicles,' North's translation of 'Plutarch,' widely read romances, and successful plays. In this regard he betrayed something of the practical temperament which is traceable in the conduct of the affairs of his later life. It was doubtless with the calculated aim of exploiting public taste to the utmost that he unceasingly adapted, as his genius dictated, themes which had already, in the hands of inferior writers or dramatists, proved capable of arresting public attention.

The professional playwrights retained no legal interest in their plays after disposing of the manuscript to a theatrical manager, and it was customary for the manager to invite extensive revision at the hands of others before a play was produced on the stage, and again whenever it was revived. Shakespeare doubtless gained his earliest experience as a dramatist by revising or rewriting behind the scenes plays that his manager had purchased. Possibly not all his labours in this direction have been identified. In a few cases his alterations were slight, but as a rule his fund of originality was too abundant to restrict him, when working as an adapter, to mere recension, and the results of most of his labours in that capacity are entitled to rank among original compositions.

The exact order in which Shakespeare's plays were written depends largely on conjecture. External evidence is accessible in only a few cases, and, although always worthy of the utmost consideration, is not invariably conclusive. The date of publication rarely indicates the date of composition. Only sixteen of the thirty-seven plays commonly assigned to Shakespeare were published in his lifetime, and it is questionable whether any were published under his supervision. But subject-matter and metre both afford rough clues to the period in his career to which each play may be referred. In his early plays the spirit of comedy or tragedy appears in all its simplicity, but as his powers grew to maturity he depicted life in its complexity, and portrayed with masterly insight all the gradations of human sentiment, and the mysterious workings of human passion. Comedy and tragedy are gradually blended; and his work finally developed a pathos such as could only have come of ripe experience. Similarly the metre undergoes emancipation from established rule and becomes flexible and irregular enough to respond to every phase of human feeling. In the blank verse of the early plays a pause is strictly observed at the close of each line, and rhyming couplets are frequent. Gradually the verse overrides such artificial restrictions; rhyme largely disappears; the pause is varied indefinitely; extra syllables are, contrary to strict metrical law, introduced at the end of lines, and at times in the middle; recourse is more frequently made to prose (cf. W. S. WALKER, Shakespeare's Versification, 1864; CHARLES BATHURST, Difference in Shakespeare's Versification at different Periods of his Life, 1857). Fantastic and punning conceits which abound in early work are rarely accorded admission to later work. At the same time allowance must be made for ebb and flow in Shakespeare's artistic progress. Early work occasionally anticipates features that become habitual to late work, and late work at times embodies traits that are mainly identified with early work. No exclusive reliance in determining the precise chronology can be placed on the merely mechanical tests afforded by tables of metrical statistics. The chronological order can only be deduced with any confidence from a consideration of all the internal characteristics as well as the known external history of each play. The premisses are often vague and conflicting, and no chronology hitherto suggested receives at all points universal assent.

There is no external evidence that any piece in which he had a hand was produced before the spring of 1592. No play by him was published before 1597, and none bore his name on the title-page till 1598. But his first essays have been with confidence allotted to 1591. To 'Love's Labour's Lost' may reasonably be assigned priority in point of time of all Shakespeare's dramatic productions. Internal evidence alone indicates the date of composition, and proves that it was an early effort, but the subject-matter suggests that its author had already enjoyed extended opportunities of surveying London life and manners, such as were hardly open to him in the very first years of his settlement. 'Love's Labour's Lost' embodies keen observation of contemporary life in many ranks of society, both in town and country, while the speeches of the hero Biron clothe much sound philosophy in masterly rhetoric. Its slender plot stands almost alone among Shakespeare's plots in that it is not known to have been borrowed. The names of the chief characters are drawn from those of the leaders in the civil war in France, which was in progress between 1589 and 1594, and was anxiously watched by the English public. Contemporary projects of academies for disciplining young men; fashions of speech and dress current in fashionable circles; recent attempts on the part of Elizabeth's government to negotiate with the czar of Russia; the inefficiency of rural constables and the pedantry of village schoolmasters and curates are all satirised with good humour (cf. 'A New Study of "Love's Labour's Lost,"' by the present writer in Gen. Mag. October 1880; Transactions of the New Shakespeare Society, pt. iii. p. 80*). The play was revised in 1597, probably for a performance at court. It was first published next year, and on the title-page, which described the piece as 'newly corrected and augmented,' Shakespeare's name first appeared in print as that of author of a play.

The revision of plays.

Chronology of the plays.

'Love's Labour's Lost'

Less gaiety characterised another comedy of the same date, 'The Two Gentlemen of Verona,' which dramatises a romance of Veronician story of love and friendship. There is every likelihood that it was an adaptation—amounting to a re-formation—of a lost 'History of Felix and Philomena,' which had been acted at court in 1584. The story is the same as that of 'The Sheperdese Felismena' in the Spanish pastoral romance of 'Diana' by George de Montemayor. No English translation of 'Diana' was published before that of Bartholomew Yonge in 1598, but manuscript versions may have been accessible. Barnabe Rich's story of 'Apollonius and Silla,' which Shakespeare employed again in 'Twelfth Night,' doubtless gave him some hints. Trifling and irritating conceits abound in the 'Two Gentlemen,' but passages of high poetic spirit are not wanting, and the speeches of the clowns, Launce and Speed, overflow with farcical drollery. The 'Two Gentlemen' was not published in Shakespeare's lifetime; it first appeared in the folio of 1623, after having, in all probability, undergone some revision (cf. FLEAY, Life, pp. 188 seq.).

Shakespeare next tried his hand, in the 'Comedy of Errors' (commonly known at the time as 'Errors'), at boisterous farce. It may have been founded on a play, no longer extant, called 'The Historie of Error,' which was acted in 1576 at Hampton Court. In subject-matter it resembles the 'Menæchmi' of Plautus, and treats of mistakes of identity arising from the likeness of twin-born children. The scene (act iii. sc. i.) in which Antipholus of Ephesus is shut out from his own house, while his brother and wife are at dinner within, recalls one in the 'Amphitruo' of Plautus. It is possible that Shakespeare had direct recourse to Plautus as well as to the old play; no English translation of Plautus was published before 1595. In the 'Comedy of Errors' (which was first published in 1623) allusion is made, as in 'Love's Labour's Lost,' to the civil war in France. France is described as 'making war against her heir' (act v. sc. ii. 125).

To more effective account did Shakespeare in 'Romeo and Juliet' (his first tragedy, turn a tragic romance of Italian origin, which was already popular in the English versions of Arthur Broke in verse (1503) and William Painter in prose (in his 'Palace of Pleasure,' 1567). Shakespeare made little change in the plot, but he impregnated it with poetic fervour, and relieved the tragic intensity by developing the humour of Mercutio, and by grafting on the story the new comic character of the Nurse (cf. Originals and Analogues, pt. i. ed. P. A. Daniel, New Shakespeare Society). The fineness of insight which Shakespeare here brought to the portrayal of youthful emotion is as noticeable as the lyric beauty and exuberance of the language. If the Nurse's remark, "'Tis since the earthquake now eleven years' (i. iii. 23), be taken literally, the composition of the play must be referred to 1591, for no earthquake in the sixteenth century was experienced in England after 1580. There are some parallelisms with Daniel's 'Complainte of Rosamond,' published in 1592, and it is probable that Shakespeare completed the piece in that year. It was first anonymously and surreptitiously printed by John Danter in 1597 from an imperfect acting copy. A second quarto of 1599 (by T. Creede for Cutlbert Burbie) was printed from an authentic version which had undergone much revision (cf. 'Parallel Texts,' ed. P. A. Daniel, New Shakespeare Society; FLEAY, Life, pp. 191 seq.).

Three other pieces of the period, of the first production of which we have direct information, reveal Shakespeare undisguisedly as an adapter of plays by other hands. On 3 March 1592 a new piece, called 'Henry VI.' 'Henry VI,' was acted at the Rose Theatre by Lord Strange's men. It was no doubt the play which was subsequently known as Shakespeare's '1 Henry VI.' On its first production it won a popular triumph. 'How would it have joyed brave Talbot (the terror of the French),' wrote Nash in his 'Pierce Pennilesse' (1592, licensed 8 Aug.), in reference to the striking scenes of Talbot's death (act iv. sc. vi. and vii.), 'to thinke that after he had lyne two hundred yeares in his Tombe, hee should triumphe againe on the Stage, and have his bones newe embalmed with the teares of ten thousand spectators at least (at severall times) who, in the Tragedian that represents his person, imagine they behold him fresh bleeding!' There is no record of the production of a second piece in continuation of the theme, but it quickly followed, for a third piece, treating of the concluding incidents of Henry VI's reign, attracted much attention on the stage early in the following autumn.

The applause attending this effort drew from one rival dramatist a rancorous protest. Robert Greene, who died on 8 Sept. 1592, wrote on his deathbed an ill-natured farewell to life, entitled 'Groats-worth of Wit bought with a Million of Repentance.' Addressing three brother dramatists—Marlowe, Nash, and Peele or Lodge—he bade them beware of puppets 'that speak from our mouths,' and of 'antics garnished in our colours.' 'There is,' he continued, 'an upstart Crow, beautified with our feathers, that with his Tyggers heart wrapt in a players hide supposes he is as well able to bumbast out a blanke verse as the best of you; and being an absolute Johannes factotum is in his owne conceit the only Shake-scene in a countrie. . . . Never more acquaint [those apes] with your admired inventions, for it is pity men of such rare wits should be subject to the pleasures of such rude groomes.' The 'only Shake-scene' is a punning denunciation of Shakespeare. The tirade was probably inspired by an author's resentment of the energy of the actor—the theatre's factotum—in revising professional dramatic work. The italicised quotation travesties a line from the third piece in the trilogy of Shakespeare's 'Henry VI':

Oh Tiger's heart wrapt in a woman's hide.

But Shakespeare's amiability of character and versatile ability had already won him admirers. In December 1592 Greene's publisher, Henry Chettle, prefixed to his 'Kind Hartes Dreame' an apology.

Chettle's

apology for Greene's attack on the young actor. 'I am as sorry,' he wrote, 'as if the originall fault had bene my fault because my selfe have seene his (i.e. Shakespeare's) demeanour no lesse civill than he [is] exelent in the qualitie he professes, besides divers of worship have reported his uprightness of dealing, which argues his honesty, and his facetious grace in writing that approoves his art.'

The first of the three plays dealing with the reign of Henry VI was first published in the collected edition of Shakespeare's works; the second and third plays were previously printed in a form very different from that which they assumed of 'Henry VI' when they followed it in the folio. Criticism has proved beyond doubt that in these plays Shakespeare did no more than add, revise, and correct other men's work. In pt. i. the scene in the Temple Gardens, where white and red roses are plucked as emblems by the rival political parties (act ii. sc. iv.), the dying speech of Mortimer, and perhaps the wooing of Margaret by Suffolk, alone bear the impress of his style. A play dealing with the second part of Henry VI's reign was published anonymously from a rough stage copy in 1594, with the title 'The first part of the Contention betwixt the two famous houses of Yorke and Lancaster.' A play dealing with the third part was published with greater care next year under the title 'The True Tragedie of Richard, Duke of Yorke, and the death of good King Henry the Sixt, as it was sundrie times acted by the Earl of Pembroke his servants.' In both these plays Shakespeare's hand can be traced. The humours of Jack Cade in 'The Contention' can only owe their savour to him. After he had hastily revised them, perhaps with another's aid, they were doubtless put on the stage in 1592, the first two parts by his own company (Lord Strange's men), and the third, under some exceptional arrangement, by Lord Pembroke's men. But Shakespeare was not content to leave them thus. Within a brief interval, possibly for a revival, he undertook a more thorough revision, still in conjunction with another writer. The first part of 'The Contention' was thoroughly overhauled, and was converted into what was entitled in the folio '2 Henry VI'; there more than half the lines are new. 'The True Tragedie,' which became '3 Henry VI,' was less drastically handled; two-thirds of it was left practically untouched; only a third was completely recast (cf. FLEISCH, Life, pp. 235 seq.; Trans. New Shakespeare Soc., 1876, pt. ii. by Miss Jane Lee; SWINBURNE, Study, pp. 51 seq.)

Who Shakespeare's coadjutors were in the two revisions of 'Henry VI' cannot be determined. The theory that Greene and Peele produced the original draft of the three parts of 'Henry VI' may help to account for Greene's indignation. Much can be said, too, in behalf of this suggestion that Shakespeare joined Marlowe, the greatest of his predecessors, in the first revision which resulted in 'The Contention' and the 'True Tragedie,' and that Marlowe returned the compliment by adding a few touches to the final revision, for which Shakespeare was mainly responsible.

Many of Shakespeare's comedies—notably 'Midsummer Night's Dream' and 'Much Ado about Nothing'—exhibit familiarity with the dramatic work of John Lyly. Elsewhere traces may be found of an appreciative study of the writings of Samuel Daniel, Sir Philip Sidney, and Thomas Lodge. But Marlowe alone of Shakespeare's contemporaries can be credited with exerting on him any substantial influence. Marlowe was in 1592 and 1593 at the zenith of his fame, and two of Shakespeare's earliest historical tragedies, 'Richard III' and 'Richard II,' which formed the natural sequel of his labours on 'Henry VI,' betray an ambition to labour in Marlowe's footsteps. In 'Richard III' Shakespeare takes up the history of England near the point at which the third part of 'Henry VI' left it.

The subject was already familiar to dramatists, but Shakespeare sought his materials in Holinshed. A Latin piece, by Dr. Thomas Legge, had been in favour with academic audiences since 1579, and in 1594 the

'Richard III.' 'True Tragedie of Richard III' was published anonymously; but Shakespeare's piece bears little resemblance to either. Throughout Shakespeare's 'Richard III' the effort to emulate Marlowe is undeniable. It is, says Mr. Swinburne, 'as fiery in passion, as single in purpose, as rhetorical often, though never so inflated in expression, as "Tamburlaine" itself.' The turbulent piece was naturally popular. Burbage's impersonation of the hero was one of his most effective performances, and his vigorous enunciation of 'A horse, a horse! my kingdom for a horse!' gave the line proverbial currency.

'Richard II' seems to have followed 'Richard III' without delay. Subsequently both were published anonymously in the same year (1597) as they had 'been publickely acted by the right Honorable the Lorde Chamberlaine his servante'; but the deposition scene in 'Richard II,' which dealt with a topic distasteful to the queen, was omitted from the early impressions. Though 'Richard II' was in style and treatment far less deeply indebted to Marlowe than its predecessor, it was clearly suggested by Marlowe's 'Edward II,' which it imitates at many points in the development and collapse of the weak king's character—the leading theme. Shakespeare drew the facts from Holinshed, but his embellishments are numerous and include the magnificently eloquent eulogy of England which is set in the mouth of John of Gaunt. Prose is avoided throughout the play, a certain sign of early work. The piece was probably composed very early in 1598. The 'Merchant of Venice,' which is of later date, bears a somewhat similar relation to Marlowe's 'Jew of Malta.'

In 'As you like it' (iii. 5, 80) Shakespeare parenthetically commemorated his acquaintance with, and his general indebtedness to, the elder dramatist by apostrophising him in the lines

Dead Shepherd! now I find thy saw of might:
'Who ever loved that loved not at first sight?

The second line is a quotation from Marlowe's poem 'Hero and Leander.'

Between February 1593 and the end of the year the London theatres were closed, owing to the prevalence of the plague. But Shakespeare was busily employed, and before the close of 1594 gave marvellous proofs of his rapid powers of production.

'Titus Andronicus' was in his own lifetime claimed for Shakespeare, but Edward Ravenscroft [q. v.], who prepared a new version in 1678, wrote of it: 'I have been told by some anciently conversant with the stage that it was not originally his, but brought by a private author to be acted, and he only gave some master-touches to one or two of the principal parts or characters.' Ravenscroft's assertion deserves acceptance. The tragedy contains powerful lines and situations, but is far too repulsive in plot and treatment, and too ostentatious in classical allusions to connect it with Shakespeare's acknowledged work. Ben Jonson credits 'Titus Andronicus' with a popularity equalling Kyd's 'Spanish Tragedy,' and internal evidence shows that Kyd was capable of writing much of 'Titus.'

It was suggested by a piece called 'Titus and Vespasian,' which Lord Strange's men played on 11 April 1592 (Henslowe, p. 24); this is only extant in a German version acted by English players in Germany, and published in 1620 (cf. COHN, Shakespeare in Germany, pp. 155 et seq.) 'Titus Andronicus' was doubtless taken in hand soon after the production of 'Titus and Vespasian' in order to exploit popular interest in the topic. It was acted by the Earl of Sussex's men on 23 Jan. 1593-4, when it was described as a new piece; but that it was also acted subsequently by Shakespeare's company is shown by the title-pages of the first and second editions, which describe it as having been performed by the Earl of Derby's and the lord chamberlain's servants (successive titles of Shakespeare's company), as well as by those of the Earls of Pembroke and Sussex. It was entered on the 'Stationers' Register' to John Danter on 6 Feb. 1594 (ARBER, ii. 614). Only a single copy of this edition is now known; it was discovered at Lund, Sweden, in 1903, and was acquired by an American collector.

For part of the plot of 'The Merchant of Venice' Shakespeare seems to have had recourse to 'Il Pecorone,' a collection of Italian novels by Ser Giovanni Fiorentino. There a Jewish creditor demands a pound of flesh of a defaulting Christian debtor, and the latter is rescued through the advocacy of 'the lady of Belmont.' A similar story figures in the 'Gesta Romanorum,' while the tale of the caskets is told independently in another portion of the same work. But Shakespeare's 'Merchant' owes much to other sources, including more than one old play. Stephen Gosson describes in his 'Schoole of Abuse' (1579) a lost play called 'the Jew . . . showne at the Bull[in]n . . . representing the greedinesse of worldly chusers and bloody mindes of usurers.' This description suggests that the two stories of the pound of flesh and the caskets had been combined before. The scenes in Shakespeare's play in which Antonio negotiates with Shylock are roughly anticipated, too, by dialogues between a Jewish creditor Gerontus and a Christian debtor in the extant play of 'The Three Ladies of London,' by [Robert] [Wilson] 1584.

Above all is it of interest to note that Shakespeare in 'The Merchant of Venice' betrayed for the last time his discipleship to Marlowe. Although the delicate comedy which lightens the serious interest of Shakespeare's play sets it in a different category from that of Marlowe's 'Jew of Malta,' the humanised portrait of the Jew Shylock embodies reminiscences of Marlowe's caricature of the Jew Barabbas. Doubtless the popular interest aroused by the trial in February 1594 and the execution in June of the queen's Jewish physician, Roderigo Lopez [q.v.], incited Shakespeare to a new and subtler study of Jewish character (cf. 'The Original of Shylock,' by the present writer, in Gent. Mag. February 1880; Dr. H. GRAETZ, Shylock in den Sagen, in den Dramen und in der Geschichte, Krotoschin, 1880; and New Shakspere Soc. Trans. 1887-92, pt. ii. pp. 158-92). The main interest of the 'Merchant' culminates in the trial scene and Shylock's discomfiture, but there is an ease in the transition to the gently poetic and humorous incidents of the concluding act which attests a rare mastery of stagecraft. The 'Venesyon Comedy,' which Henslowe, the manager, produced at the Rose on 25 Aug. 1594, was probably the earliest version of the 'Merchant of Venice.' It was not published till 1600, when two editions appeared, each printed from a different stage-copy.

To 1594 must also be assigned 'King John,' which, like the 'Comedy of Errors' and

'Richard II,' altogether e-chews prose; it was not printed till 1623. The piece was directly adapted from a worthless play called 'The Troublesome Raigne of King John' (1591), which was fraudulently reissued in 1611 as 'written by W. Sh.,' and in 1622 as by 'W. Shakespeare.' There is very small ground for associating Marlowe's name with the old play. Into the adaptation Shakespeare flung all his energy, and the theme grew under his hand into genuine tragedy. The three chief characters—the king, Constance, and Faulconbridge—are in all essentials of his own invention, and are portrayed with a sureness of touch that leaves no doubt of his developing strength.

At the close of 1594 a performance of Shakespeare's early farce, 'The Comedy of Errors,' gave him a passing notoriety that he could well have spared. The piece was played on the evening of Innocent's day (28 Dec.) 1594, in the hall of Gray's Inn, before a crowded audience of benchers, students, and their friends. Shakespeare was not present; he was acting on the same night before the queen at Greenwich. There was some disturbance during the evening on the part of guests from the Inner Temple, who, dissatisfied with the accommodation afforded them, retired in indignation. 'So that night,' the contemporary chronicler states, 'was ever afterwards called the "Night of Errors"' (Gesta Grayorum, printed in 1688 from a contemporary manuscript). Next day a commission of oyer and terminer inquired into the causes of the tumult, which was attributed to a sorcerer having 'foisted a company of base and common fellows to make up our disorders with a play of errors and confusions.' (A second performance at Gray's Inn Hall was given by the Elizabethan Stage Society 6 Dec. 1895.)

Two other plays attracted much public attention during the period under review (1591-4)—'Arden of Feversham' (licensed 3 April 1592, and published in 1592) and 'Edward III' (licensed for publication 1 Dec. 1595, and published in 1596). Shakespeare's hand has been traced in both, mainly on the ground that their dramatic energy is of superior quality to that found in the extant efforts of any contemporary. There is no external evidence in favour of Shakespeare's authorship in either case. 'Arden of Feversham' dramatises with intensity and insight a sordid story of the murder of a husband by a wife which took place in 1551, and was fully reported by Holinshed. The subject is of a different type from any which Shakespeare is known to have treated, and although the play may be, as Mr. Swinburne insists, 'a young man's work,' it bears no relation either in topic or style to the work on which young Shakespeare was engaged at a period so early as 1591 or 1592. A play in Marlowe's vein, 'Edward III,' which Capell reprinted in his 'Prolusions' in 1760 and described as 'thought to be writ by Shakespeare,' has been assigned to him on even more shadowy grounds. Many speeches scattered through the drama, and one whole scene—that in which the Countess of Salisbury repulses the advances of Edward III—show the hand of a master (act ii. sc. 2). But there is even in the style of these contributions much to dissociate them from Shakespeare's accredited productions, and justify their ascription to some less efficient disciple of Marlowe (cf. SWINBURNE, Study of Shakspeare, pp. 281-274). A line in act ii. sc. i. ('Lilies that fester smell far worse than weeds') reappears in Shakespeare's 'Sonnets' (xciv. l. 14). It was contrary to his practice to literally plagiarise himself. The line was doubtless borrowed from a manuscript copy of the 'Sonnets.'

Early plays doubtfully assigned to Shakespeare.

During these busy years (1591-4) Shakespeare came before the public in yet another literary capacity. On 18 April 1593 his friend Richard Field, the printer, who was his fellow-townsmen, obtained a license for the publication of 'Venus and Adonis,' a love poem, written with a license which stamps it as a product of youth. It was published a month or two later, without an author's name on the title-page, but Shakespeare appended his full name to the dedication, which he addressed in conventional style to Henry Wriothesley, earl of Southampton. 'I know not how I shall offend,' he wrote, 'in dedicating my unpolished lines to your lordship, nor how the world will censure me for choosing so strong a prop for supporting so weak a burden. . . . But if the first heir of my invention prove deformed, I shall be sorry it had so noble a godfather.' 'The first heir of my invention' implies that the poem was written before Shakespeare's dramatic work. The title-page bears a Latin motto from Ovid's 'Amores.' Lodge's 'Scillas Metamorphosis,' which appeared in 1589, is not only written in the same metre (six-line stanzas rhyming ababcc), but opens with the same incidents, and deals with them in the same spirit. There is little doubt that Shakespeare drew from Lodge some of his inspiration (Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis and Lodge's Scillas Metamorphosis, by James P. Reardon, in 'Shakespeare Society's Papers,' iii. 148-6).

A year later, in 1594, Shakespeare published another poem in like style, but in seven-line (Chaucer's rhyme royal, ababbc) instead of six-line stanzas. It was entered in the 'Stationers' Register' on 9 May 1594 under this title of 'A Booke of "Lucrece,"' intitled the Ravysheiment of Lucrece, and was published in the same year under the title 'Lucrece.' Richard Field printed it, and John Harrison published it and sold it at the sign of the White Greyhound in St. Paul's Churchyard. Samuel Daniel's 'Complaint of Rosamond' (1592) stood to 'Lucrece' in something of the same relation as Lodge's 'Scilla' to 'Venus and Adonis.' Again, Shakespeare dedicated the volume to the Earl of Southampton, but instead of addressing him in the frigid compliment that was habitual to dedications, he employs the outspoken language of devoted friendship: 'The love I dedicate to your lordship is without end, whereof this pamphlet without beginning is but a superfluous moiety. . . . What I have done is yours; what I have to do is yours; being part in all I have, devoted yours.'

Both the poems were widely read and appreciated. They drew upon Shakespeare's far larger share of public notice than his early dramatic productions. No less than seven editions of 'Venus' appeared between 1594 and 1602, and an eighth followed in 1617. 'Lucrece' reached a fifth edition a year earlier. 'Lucrece,' wrote Michael Drayton in his 'Legend of Matilda' (1594), was 'revived to live another age.' In 1596 William Clerke [q. v.] in his 'Polimantein' gave 'all praise' to 'Sweet Shakespeare' for his 'Lucrecia.' John Weever, in a sonnet addressed to 'Honey-tongued Shakespeare' in his 'Epigrams' (1596), eulogised the two poems as his main achievement, although he mentioned Romeo and Richard and 'mors whose names I know not.' Richard Carew at the same time classed him with Marlowe as deserving the praises of an English Catullus ('Excellencie of this English Tongue' in CAMDEN's Remaines, p. 48). There is a likelihood, too, that Spenser was drawn by the poems into the ranks of Shakespeare's admirers. There is little doubt that Spenser referred to Shakespeare in 'Colin Clouts come home againe' (completed in 1594), under the name of 'Aetion' (a familiar Greek proper name derived from Aeëds, an eagle).

And there, though last not least is Aetion;

A gentler Shepheard may no where be found,
Whose mues, full of high thought's invention,
Doth, like himselfe, heroically sound.

The last line seems to allude to Shakespeare's surname. The admiration was doubtless mutual. That Shakespeare knew Spenser's work appears from a plain reference to his 'Teares of the Muses' (1591) in 'Midsummer Night's Dream' (v. i. 52-3). But there is no ground for assuming that Spenser in the 'Teares of the Muses' referred to Shakespeare when deploring the recent death of 'Our pleasant Willy.' A comic actor, 'dead of late' in a literal sense, is clearly intended [see under PARLETON, RICHARD]. The 'gentle spirit' who is described in a later stanza as sitting 'in idle cell' rather than turn his pen to base uses cannot be more reasonably identified with Shakespeare.

Meanwhile Shakespeare was gaining personal esteem outside the circles of actors and men of letters. His genius and 'civil demeanour' of which Chettle wrote arrested the notice of noble patrons of literature and the drama. His summons to act at court with the most famous actors of the day at the Christmas of 1594 was possibly due in part to personal interest in himself. Elizabeth quickly showed him special favour. Until the end of her reign his plays were repeatedly acted in her presence. The revised version of 'Love's Labour's Lost' was given at Whitehall at Christmas 1597, and tradition credits the queen with unconcealed enthusiasm for Falstaff, who came into being a little later. Under Elizabeth's successor he greatly strengthened his hold on royal favour, but Ben Jonson claimed that the queen's appreciation equalled that of James I. Jonson wrote of

Those flights upon the banks of Thames,
That so did take Eliza and our James.

To Shakespeare's personal relations with men and women of the court his 'Sonnets' owed their existence. Between 1591 and 1597 no aspirant to poetic fame in England failed to seek a patron's ear by a trial of skill as a sonneteer. Shakespeare applied himself to sonneteering when the fashion was at its height. Many critics are convinced that throughout the 'Sonnets' Shakespeare avows the experiences of his own heart (cf. C. ARMITAGE BROWN, Shakespeare's Autobiographical Poems, 1888; RICHARD SIMPSON, Philosophy of Shakespeare's Sonnets, 1868). But the two concluding sonnets (cliii. and cliv.) are directly suggested by an apologue illustrating the potency of love which figures in the Greek anthology (Palatine Anthology, ix. 627). Elsewhere many conceits are adapted from contemporary sonnets.

While Shakespeare's poems bear traces of personal emotion and are coloured by personal experience, they seem to have been to a large extent undertaken as literary exercises. His ever-present dramatic instinct may be held to account for most of the illusion of personal confession which they call up in many minds. Their style suggests that they came from a youthful pen—from a man not more than thirty. Probably a few dated from 1591, and the bulk of them were composed within a brief period of the publication of his two narrative poems in 1594. The rhythm and metre display in the best examples—for the inequalities are conspicuous—a more mellowed sweetness than is found in those works. The thought is usually more condensed, and obscure conceits are more numerous. But these results may be assigned in part to the conditions imposed by the sonnet-form and in part to the sonnets' complex theme. External evidence confirms the theory of their early date. Shakespeare's early proficiency as a sonneteer and his enthusiasm for the sonnet-form are both attested by his introduction of two admirably turned sonnets into the dramatic dialogue of 'Love's Labour's Lost'—probably his earliest play. It has, too, been argued—ingeniously, if on slender grounds—that he was author of the sonnet, 'Phaeton, to his friend Florio,' which prefaced in 1591 'Florio's Second Frutes' (MINTO, Characteristics of English Poetry, 1885, pp. 371-382). A line from a fully accredited sonnet (xciv.) was quoted in 'Edward III,' which was probably written before 1595. Meres, writing in 1598, mentions Shakespeare's 'sugred sonnets among his private friends' in close conjunction with his two narrative poems. That all the sonnets were in existence before Meres wrote is rendered probable by the fact that William Jaggard piratically inserted in 1599 two of the most mature of the series (Nos. cxxxviii and cxlv.) in his 'Passionate Pilgrim.' Shakespeare speaks of himself in the first of these two sonnets as feeling the incidents of age ('my days are past the best'). But when the two poems fell into Jaggard's predatory hands in 1599, the poet was only thirty-five. Hence there is no ground for the assumption that the many references to his growing years demand a literal interpretation and prove a far later date of composition (cf. xxx. lxi. lxxiii.) The 'Sonnets' were first published in 1609, but Shakespeare cannot be credited with any responsibility for the publication. There was appended a previously unpublished poem of forty-nine seven-line stanzas (the metre of 'Lucrece'), entitled 'A Lover's Complaint,' in which a girl laments her betrayal by a deceitful youth. If, as is possible, it be by Shakespeare, it must have been written in very early days.

Their early date.

Shakespeare's 'Sonnets' ignore the somewhat complex scheme of rhyme adopted by Petrarch and followed by nearly all the great English sonneteers.

Seeking greater metrical simplicity, they consist of three decasyllabic quatrains with a concluding couplet, and the quatrains rhyme alternately. It is rarely that a single sonnet forms an independent poem. As in the sonnets of Spenser, Sidney, and Drayton, the same train of thought is pursued continuously through two or more. The collection, numbering 164 sonnets in all, thus presents the appearance of a series of poems, each in a varying number of fourteen-line stanzas. It seems doubtful if the order in which the sequences are printed preserves that in which they were penned. It is rarely that a single sonnet or a short sequence of sonnets betrays much logical connection with those that precede or follow (cf. cxlv. cxlvi. and cli.)

No clear nor connected story is deducible from the poems, which divide themselves into two main groups. In the first (i.-cxxxvi.), Shakespeare addressees for the most part a young man.

In the opening sequence, the right of which to priority seems questionable, the youth is urged to marry that his beauty may survive in children (i.-xvii.). Elsewhere the poet insists, in language originally borrowed from classical literature but habitual to sonneteers of the day, that his verse will perpetuate for ever his friend's memory (xviii. xix. liv. lv. lx. lxi. lxv. lxxxi. cvii.). In four sequences (xxvii.-xxxii. xliii.-lvi. xvii.-xcix. cxiii.-cxiv.) the poet dwells on the effects of absence in intensifying love. At times the youth is rebuked for sensuality (xxxii.-xxxv. lxix.-lxx. xcix.-xcvi.). At times melancholy overwhelms the writer; he despairs of the corruptions of the age, and longs for death (lxvi.-lxviii. lxxi.-lxxiv.). In one sequence the writer's equanimity is disturbed by the favour bestowed by a young patron on a rival poet (lxxviii.-lxxxvi.). The first group concludes with a series of sequences in which the poet declares his constancy in friendship.

In the second group, most of which are addressed to a woman (cxxxvi.-cli.), Shakespeare, in accord with a contemporary convention of sonneteers, narrates more or less connectedly the story of the disdainful rejection of a lover by an accomplished eiren with raven-black hair and eyes. In one group of six sonnets (xl. xli. xlii. cxxxiii. cxxxiv. cxliv.), which stands apart from those that immediately succeed or follow them, a more personal note seems to be struck. The six poems relate how the writer's mistress has corrupted his friend and drawn him from his 'side.' Sonnet cxliv. (published by Jaggard in 1599) suggested the state of feeling generated by this episode:

Two loves I had of comfort and despair,
Which like two spirits do suggest [i.e. tempt] me still;
The better angel is a man right fair,
The worser spirit a woman coloured ill.

The story of intrigue developed in these six sonnets is not easily paralleled. It may owe its origin to a genuine experience of the poet himself.

Many attempts have been made to identify among Shakespeare's contemporaries anonymous persons to whom the poet seems to refer, but no result hitherto reached rests on sure foundations. The sole clue the text offers lies in the plain avowal that a young man was a patron of the poet's verse, which had derived from him 'fair assistance' (Sonnet lxxviii.) Shakespeare is not known to have formally acknowledged any literary patron except Southampton, and some of the phrases in the dedication to 'Lucrece' so closely resemble expressions that were addressed in the sonnets to a young friend as to identify the latter with Southampton. Southampton, Shakespeare's junior by nine years, was a patron of literature and of the drama. On 11 Oct. 1599 he was spoken of as passing 'away the tyme in London merely in going to plaies every day' (Sidney Papers, ii. 132), and when Queen Anne of Denmark visited him in London in January 1604-5, Shakespeare's 'Love's Labour's Lost' was performed (Hatfield MSS.; HALLIWELL-PHILLIPS, ii. 88, 167). John Florio [q. v.] may be reasonably included among Shakespeare's early London friends, although there is little ground for regarding him as the original of Holofernes in 'Love's Labour's Lost,' and he was long in Southampton's 'pay and patronage.' An independent tradition confirms the closeness of Shakespeare's intimacy with Southampton.

According to Rowe, 'there is one instance so singular in its magnificence of this patron of Shakespeare's that if I had not been assured that the story was handed down by Sir William D'Avenant, who was probably very well acquainted with his affairs, I should not have ventured to have inserted; that my Lord Southampton at one time gave him a thousand pounds to enable him to go through with a purchase which he heard he had a mind to.'

Shakespeare's description of the rival poet, 'of tall building and goodly pride,' and the references to 'the proud full sail of his great verse,' would (it is commonly suggested) apply to George Chapman, and allusions have been detected in Sonnets lxxii. and lxxvi. to Chapman's devotion to Homer, and to phraseology employed by Chapman in his 'Shadow of Night,' 1594 (cf. MINTO, Characteristics, p. 291; Leopold Shakspeare, ed. Furnivall, lxxv.) But Chapman was only one among many of the protégés of Southampton, and another of them, Barnabe Barnes, has claimed to be considered 'the rival poet' of the 'Sonnets.' Southampton married in 1598, against the queen's wish, Elizabeth, daughter of John Vernon, a lady of the court, but there is no ground for identifying her with the conventional lady of the 'Sonnets' (cf. GERALD MASSEY, Secret Drama of Shakespeare's Sonnets, 1888).

Other theories of identification rest on wholly erroneous premisses. Shakespeare undoubtedly plays more than once on his own Christian name, Will (cxxxv.-vi., cxlii.); but there is nothing in the wording of these punning passages to warrant the assumption that his friend bore the same appellation (this misinterpretation is attributable to the misprinting in the early editions of the second 'will' as 'Will' in cxxxv. l. 1). No more importance can be attached to the fantastic suggestion that the line describing the youth as

A man in hue all hues in his controlling

(xx. 7), and other applications of the word 'hue,' imply that his surname was Hughes. There is no other pretence of argument for the conclusion that the friend's name was William Hughes. No known contemporary of the name answers either in age or position in life the requirements of the problem (Notes and Queries, 5th ser. v. 443).

A third theory has received wide acceptance. When the sonnets were published in 1609 they appeared with the following dedication: 'To the onlie, begetter, of these inueng. sonnets. | Mr. W. H. all happiness. | and. that. eternitie. | promised. | by. | ovr. ever-living. poet. | wisheth. | the. well-wishing. | aduenturer. in. | setting. | forth. | T. T.' T. T. are the initials of Thomas well known at the time in the book trade who neither printed books nor sold them, but procured manuscripts how they could, and, in the absence of any copyright law, the means they employed were not keenly scanned. Having procured the manuscript, they commissioned others to print and sell the book, and in the case of Shakespeare's 'Sonnets' Thorpe commissioned George Eld to print them, and the function of distribution he divided between John Wright and William Aspley. Some title-pages give Wright's name as the seller, others give Aspley's. Thorpe stood in no need of Shakespeare's assent before publishing his 'Sonnets,' and there is no ground for supposing that it was given or even invited. The volume's tradesmanlike entry as 'Shakespeare's Sonnets,' not only in the 'Stationers' Register' but also on the title-page, practically confers on the speculator in the manuscript—the well-wishing adventurer in setting forth—sole responsibility for the enterprise.

Thorpe, who procured the manuscript for publication. He belonged to a class of men

As proprietor of the 'copy' Thorpe was entitled to supply the dedication. In 1600 he dedicated Marlowe's edition of 'Lucan,' the manuscript of which he had somehow acquired, to a friend in the trade, Edward Blount [q. v.] Oblivious of Thorpe's position, writers on Shakespeare have assumed that he was in Shakespeare's confidence, that 'Mr. W. H.' Shakespeare inspired or even wrote the dedication, and that the Mr. W. H. in Thorpe's inscription concealed the initials of the Sonnets' youthful hero. The perplexing phrase 'the only begetter of these enueng sonnets,' with the words that follow, was doubtless a high-flown compliment which in a dedication cannot be taken literally. No single person begot the sonnets in the sense of inspiring them; at least two persons, the youth and the dark lady, were in an equal degree sources of the poet's inspiration. 'Beget' was often used in the sense of 'get' or 'procure' (cf. 'beget . . . the reversion,' DEKKER, Satiromastix, 1602; 'acquire and beget a temperance,' Hamlet, iii. sc. 2; see MURRAY, New English Dict.) It is therefore probable that the object of the dedication was some friend of Thorpe through whose good offices the manuscript of the poems had reached his hands.

But since 1832, when James Boaden first propounded the theory in the 'Gentleman's Magazine,' Mr. W. H. has not only been regarded as the friend commemorated in the 'Sonnets,' but he has been confidently identified with William Herbert, third earl of

George Chapman.

Baseless theories.

Thomas Thorpe's
position.

Pembroke [q. v.] (cf. BOADIN, On the Sonnets of Shakespeare, 1837). Pembroke, who was known from birth until his father's death as 'Lord Herbert' exclusively, belonged to the same court circle as Southampton. He was a patron of letters: to him and his brother the first collected edition of Shakespeare's works was dedicated seven years after his death in language that suggests that he had shown appreciation of them in the poet's lifetime. But there is no evidence that he was in his youth acquainted with the poet, or at any time closely associated with him. In 1594, when the 'Sonnets' seem to have been completed, Pembroke was fourteen years old, and, although his father made an abortive effort to negotiate a marriage for him in 1598, it is unlikely that Shakespeare should have urged him at an earlier age, as he urges the youth of the 'Sonnets,' to marry. Late in 1600 Pembroke involved himself in a discreditable intrigue with a lady of the court, Mary Fitton, and the supporters of the Pembroke theory have identified Mary Fitton with the 'dark' lady (cf. Sonnets, ed. T. Tyler, 1890, passim). But no historical justification is needed for the creation of the conventional personage, and one of the 'Sonnets' in which she figures was surreptitiously published by Jaggard in 1609, before the intrigue between Pembroke and Mary Fitton is known to have begun. The identification of 'Mr. W. H.' with Pembroke seems, moreover, confuted by Thorpe's form of address. In 1601 Lord Herbert succeeded his father as Earl of Pembroke; by 1609 he was knight of the Garter and holder of many court offices. Thorpe dedicated several books to him by name, and always gave him the full benefit of his titles. He approached him like all his noble patrons, in terms of subservience. That he should have deserted his practice in the case of Shakespeare's 'Sonnets,' and should have dubbed the influential Earl of Pembroke (formerly Lord Herbert) 'Mr. W. H.,' is an inadmissible inference.

The Pembroke theory inadmissible.

The story of a lover's supersession by his friend in the favours of his mistress—the burden of those six sonnets that may have a personal significance—may possibly reflect an affair of gallantry in the poet's own life, to which obscure reference seems extant elsewhere. The adventure, in that case, caused no lasting wound. At the end of 1594 there was published a poem entitled 'Willobie his Avis' (licensed 8 Sept. 1594), in which the writer described the progress of a profound passion [see WILLOUGHBY or WILLOBIE, HENRY]. Some anonymous prefatory verses commend Shakespeare's 'Lucrece,' and by way of argument to canto xlv. the writer relates how, in search of a cure for the disastrous effects of love, he appealed to 'his familiar friend W.S., who not long before had tried the courtesy of the like passion and was now newly recovered of the like infection.' But 'W. S.' offered a remedy which aggravated the disease, 'because,' the narrator suggests, 'he [i.e. W. S.] would see whether another could play his jest better than himself, and, in viewing afar off the course of this loving comedy, he determined to see whether it would sort to a happier end for the new actor than it did for the old player.' In cantos xlv.-xlviii. Willobie engages in dialogue with W. S., who offers him chilling comfort. Although it is hazardous to hang a theory on the identity of initials, Shakespeare's recent experiences may have prompted Willobie's references to W. S., 'the old player,' and to the latter's complete recovery from love's 'infection' (WILLOBIE, Avis, ed. Grosart, 1880).

Meanwhile, despite distraction, Shakespeare's dramatic work steadily advanced. To the winter season of 1595 probably belongs 'Midsummer Night's Dream' (two editions appeared in 1600). It may well have been written to celebrate a marriage—perhaps the marriage of Lucy Harington to Edward Russell, third earl of Bedford, on 12 Dec. 1594; or that of William Stanley, earl of Derby, at Greenwich on 24 Jan. 1594-5. The elaborate compliment to the queen, 'a fair vestal throned by the west,' was at once an acknowledgment of past marks of royal favour, and an invitation for their extension to the future. The whole is in the airiest and most graceful vein of comedy. Hints for the story can be traced to a variety of sources (Ohsucer's 'Knight's Tale,' Plutarch's 'Life of Theseus,' Ovid's 'Metamorphoses,' bk. iv.), and the influence of John Lyly is noticeable, but the final scheme of the piece is of the author's invention. In the humorous presentation of Pyramus and Thisbe by the village clowns, Shakespeare improved upon a theme which he had already employed in 'Love's Labour's Lost.'

More sombre topics engaged him in the comedy of 'All's well that ends well,' which may be tentatively assigned to 1595. The plot, like that of 'Romeo and Juliet,' was drawn from Painter's 'Palace of Pleasure' (No. xxxviii.) The original source is Boccaccio's 'Decamerone' (giorn. iii. nov. 9). Shakespeare, after his wont, grafted on the touching story of Helena's love for the unworthy Bertram the comic characters of the braggart Parolles, the pompous Lafew, and a clown less witty than his compeers. Another original creation, Bertram's mother, Countess of Rousillon, is a charming portrait of old age. In frequency of rhyme and other metrical characteristics the piece closely resembles 'The Two Gentlemen,' but the characterisation betrays far greater power, and there are fewer conceits or crudities of style. The pathetic element predominates. Meres attributed to Shakespeare, in 1598, a piece called 'Love's Labour's Won.' This title, which is not otherwise known, may well be applied to 'All's Well.' 'The Taming of the Shrew,' which has also been identified with 'Love's Labour's Won,' has far slighter claim to the designation.

'The Taming of the Shrew'—which, like 'All's Well,' was first printed in the folio—was probably of a little later date. It is a revision of an old play on lines somewhat differing from those which Shakespeare had followed previously. From 'The Taming of a Shrew,' a comedy first published in 1594 (repr. Shakespeare Soc. 1844), Shakespeare drew the induction and the scenes, in which hero Petruchio conquers Catherine the Shrew. He first infused into them the genuine spirit of comedy, and introduced into the induction reminiscences of Stratford which may be due to his renewal in 1596 of personal relations with the town. The tinker, Christopher Sly, describes himself as 'Old Sly's son of Burton Heath,' who has run up a score with the fat alewife of Wincot. Burton Heath is Barton-on-the-Heath, the home of Shakespeare's aunt, Edmund Lambert's wife, and of her sons. Wincot is Wilmcote, his mother's native place. But while following the old play in its general outlines, the revised version added an entirely new underplot—the story of Bianca and her lovers, which owes something to the 'Supposes' of George Gascoigne [q. v.], an adaptation of Ariosto's 'Suppositi.' Evidence of style makes it difficult to allot the Bianca scenes to Shakespeare; as in the case of 'Henry VI,' those scenes were probably due to a coadjutor.

In 1597 Shakespeare turned once more to English history. From Holinshed's 'Chronicle,' and from a valueless but very popular piece, 'The Famous Victories of Henry V,' which was repeatedly acted between 1588 and 1595 (licensed 1594, and published 1598), he worked up with splendid energy two plays on the reign of Henry IV. They form one continuous whole, but are known respectively as parts i. and ii. of 'Henry IV.' The kingly hero had figured as a spirited young man in 'Richard II.:' he was now represented as weighed down by care and age. With him are contrasted (in part i.) his impetuous and ambitious subject Hotspur and (in both parts) his son and heir Prince Hal, whose boisterous disposition drives him from court to seek adventures among the haunts of taverns. Shakespeare, in both parts, originally named the chief of the prince's riotous companions after Sir John Oldcastle, a character in the old play. But Henry Brooke, eighth lord Cobham, who succeeded to the title early in 1597, and claimed descent from the historical Sir John Oldcastle [q. v.], the lollard leader, raised objection; and when the first part of the play was printed by the acting-company's authority in 1598 ('newly corrected' in 1599), Shakespeare Falstaff. bestowed on Prince Hal's tumbled fellow the new name of Falstaff. The latter designation was doubtless a hazy reminiscence of Sir John Fastolf [q. v.], an historical warrior who had already figured in 'Henry VI,' and was owner at one time of the Boar's Head tavern in Southwark; the prince and his companions frequent the 'Boar's Head,' Eastcheap, in 'Henry IV,' according to traditional stage directions (first adopted by Theobald in 1733; cf. HALLIWELL-PHILLIPS, ii. 257). A trustworthy edition of the second part also appeared with Oldcastle's name substituted for that of Falstaff in 1600. There the epilogue emphatically denied that Falstaff had any characteristic in common with the martyr Oldcastle. Meanwhile humbler dramatists (Munday, Wilson, Drayton, and Hathaway), seeking to profit by the attention drawn by Shakespeare to the historical Oldcastle, produced a poor dramatic version of the latter's genuine history; and of two editions published in 1600, one printed for [Thomas] Pavier was impudently described on the title-page as by Shakespeare. Shakespeare's purely comic power culminated in Falstaff, who may be claimed as the most humorous figure in literature. The Elizabethan public recognised the triumphant success of the effort, and many of Falstaff's telling phrases, with the names of his associates, Justice Shallow and Silence, at once took root in popular speech.

In all probability 'The Merry Wives of Windsor,' a comedy inclining to farce, followed close upon 'Henry IV.' 'Merry Wives of Windsor.' Rowe asserts that 'Queen Elizabeth was so well pleased with that admirable character of Falstaff in the two parts of "Henry IV." that she commanded him to continue it for one play more, and to show him in love.' Dennie, in the dedication of 'The Comical Gallant' (1702), noted that the 'Merry Wives' was written at the queen's command and by her direction; and she was so eager to see it acted that she commanded it to be finished in fourteen days, and was afterwards, as tradition tells us, very well pleased with the representation.' In his 'Letters' (1721, p. 232) Dennis reduces the period of composition to ten days—'a prodigious thing,' added Gildon (Remarks, p. 291), 'where all is so well contrived and carried on without the least confusion.' The localisation of the scene at Windsor, and the complimentary references to Windsor Castle, corroborate the tradition that it was prepared to meet a royal command. An imperfect draft of the play was printed by Thomas Creede in 1602 (cf. Shakespeare Society's reprint, 1842, ed. Halliwell); the folio of 1623 first supplied a complete version. The plot was probably suggested by an Italian novel. A tale from Straparola's 'Notti' (ii. 2), of which an adaptation figured in Tarleton's 'Newes out of Purgatorie' (1590), another tale from the 'Pecorone' of Ser Giovanni Fiorentino (ii. 2), and a third, the Fishwife's tale of Brainford in 'Westward for Smelts' (said to have been published in 1603, although no edition earlier than 1620 is known), supply incidents distantly resembling episodes in the play (cf. Shakespeare's Library, ed. Hazlitt, i. ii. 1-80). The buoyant country life was the unaided outcome of Shakespeare's own experience.

The character of Prince Hal offered to its creator as many attractions as Falstaff offered to the queen, and in 'Henry V.' 'Henry V.' Shakespeare, during 1598, brought his career to its close. The play was performed early in 1599, probably in the newly built Globe Theatre. Again Thomas Creede printed, in 1600, an imperfect draft, which was thrice reissued before a complete version was supplied in the first folio of 1623. The dramatic interest of 'Henry V.' is slender. The piece presents a series of episodes in which the hero's manliness is advantageously displayed as soldier, ruler, and lover. The topic appealed to patriotic sentiment. Besides the 'Famous Victories,' there was another piece on the subject, which Henslowe produced for the first time on 28 Nov. 1595 (Diary, p. 61). 'Henry V.' may be regarded as Shakespeare's final experiment in the dramatisation of English history. For 'Henry VIII,' which was produced very late in his career, he was only in part responsible.

In the prologue to act v. of 'Henry V.' Shakespeare foretold for Robert Devereux, second earl of Essex, 'the general of our gracious empress,' an enthusiastic reception by the people of London when he should have 'broached' rebellion in Ireland. He had set out on that disastrous mission on 27 March 1598. The fact that Southampton went with him probably accounted for Shakespeare's avowal of sympathy. But Essex's effort failed, and when he sought in 1601, again with the support of Southampton, to recover his position by stirring up rebellion in London, the friends of the rebel leaders sought the dramatist's countenance. They paid 40s. to Augustine Phillips, a leading member of Shakespeare's company, for reviving at the Globe 'Richard II.' (beyond doubt Shakespeare's play), in the hope that its scene of the deposition of a king might encourage a popular outbreak. The performance of 'Richard II.' took place on Saturday (7 Feb. 1601), the day preceding that fixed for the rising. The queen, in a conversation with William Lambarde [q.v.] on 4 Aug. 1601, complained that 'this tragedie' had been played with seditious intent 'forty times in open streets and houses' (NICHOLS, Progresses of Elizabeth, iii. 552). Phillips gave evidence against Essex and his friends, and Southampton was imprisoned until the queen's death. But no proceedings were taken against the players.

For several years Shakespeare's genius as dramatist and poet had been acknowledged by critics and playgoers alike, and his social and professional position had become considerable. Inside the theatre his influence was supreme. When, in 1598, the manager of the company rejected Ben Jonson's 'Every Man in his Humour,' Shakespeare intervened, according to a credible tradition (reported by Rowe but denounced by Gifford), and procured a reversal of the decision. He took a part when the piece was performed. Jonson, despite his difficult and jealous temper, which may have led to an occasional coolness, cherished esteem and affection for his benefactor till death (cf. GILCHRIST, Examination of the Charges . . . of Jonson's Enmity towards Shakespeare, 1808).

Tradition reports that Shakespeare joined, at the Mermaid Tavern in Bread Street, those meetings of Jonson and his associates which Beaumont described in his poetical 'Letter' to Jonson. 'Many were the wit-combats,' wrote Fuller of Shakespeare in his 'Worthies' (1632), 'betwixt him and Ben Johnson, which two I behold like a Spanish great gallion and an English man of war; Master Johnson (like the former) was built far higher in learning, solid but slow in his performances. Shakespear, with the English man of war, lesser in bulk, but lighter in sailing, could turn with all tides, tack about, and take advantage of all winds by the quickness of his wit and invention.'

Shakespeare's popularity and influence.

The Mermaid meetings.

Of the many testimonies paid to Shakespear's literary reputation at this period of his career, the most striking was that of Francis Meres [q. v.] In a survey of contemporary literary effort in England (Palladis Tamia, 1598), Meres asserted that 'the Muses would speak Shakespear's fine filed phrase if they could speak English.' 'Among the English,' Meres declared, 'he was the most excellently in both kinds for the stage' (i.e. tragedy and comedy). The titles of six comedies ('Two Gentlemen of Verona,' 'Errors,' 'Love's Labour's Lost,' 'Love's Labour's Won,' 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' and 'Merchant of Venice') and of six tragedies ('Richard II,' 'Richard III,' 'Henry IV,' 'King John,' 'Titus,' and 'Romeo and Juliet') were enumerated, and mention followed of his 'Venus and Adonis,' his 'Lucrece,' and his 'sugred sonnets among his private friends.' These were cited as proof 'that the sweet witty soul of Ovid lives in mellifluous and honey-tongued Shakespear.' In the same year, and in the same strain, Richard Barnfield, in 'Poems in divers Humors,' predicted immortality for Shakespear, whose 'honey-flowing vein had pleased the world.'

Meres's eulogy, 1598.

His name was thenceforth of value to unprincipled publishers. Already, in 1595, Thomas Creede, the surreptitious printer of 'Henry V' and the publisher of 'Merry Wives,' had issued the 'Tragedie of Locrine,' as 'newly set forth, overseene and corrected by W. S.' The like initials figured on the title-pages of 'The Puritaine, or the Widdow of Watling-streete' (printed by G. Eld in 1607), and of 'The True Chronicle Historie of Thomas, Lord Cromwell' (licensed 11 Aug. 1602, and printed by Thomas Snodham in 1613). 'The Life of Oldcastle' in 1600 (printed by Thomas Pavier), 'The London Prodigall' in 1605 (printed by T. O. for Nathaniel Butter), and 'The Yorkshire Tragedy' in 1608 (by R. B. for Thomas Pavier) were all published under the fraudulent pretence that they were by Shakespear, whose name, in full, appeared on their title-pages. None of these six plays have any internal claim to Shakespear's authorship, but all were included in the third folio of his collected works (1664). Schlegel and a few other critics have, on no grounds that merit acceptance, detected signs of Shakespear's work in 'The Yorkshire Tragedy;' it is 'a coarse, crude, and vigorous impromptu,' which is clearly by a far less experienced hand. With even smaller justification, the worthless old play on the subject of King John was attributed to Shakespear in the re-issues of 1611 and 1622. But poems as well as plays in which Shakespear had no hand were deceptively placed to his credit. In 1599 William Jaggard, another piratical publisher, issued a volume which he entitled 'The Passionate Pilgrim, by W. Shakespear.' Jaggard included two sonnets by Shakespear which were not previously in print, and three poems drawn from the already published 'Love's Labour's Lost;' but the bulk of the volume was by Richard Barnfield and others (cf. HALLIWELL-PHILLIPS, i. 401-4, for analysis of volume). When a third edition of the 'Passionate Pilgrim' was printed in 1612, Shakespear gently raised objection, according to Heywood's 'Apology for Actors' (1612), to the unwarranted use ('altogether unknown to him') of his name, and it was apparently removed from the title-page of some copies. In 1601 Shakespear's full name was appended to 'a poetical essaye on the Turtle and the Phoenix,' which was published in Robert Chester's 'Love's Martyr,' a collection of poems by Marston, Chapman, Jonson, and others. This obscure allegory may be from Shakespear's pen; happily he wrote nothing else of like character.

Shakespear, in middle life, brought to practical affairs a singularly sane and sober temperament. The anonymous author of 'Ratsai's Ghost' (1605) [see RATSEY, GAMALIEL] cynically urged an unnamed actor of repute, who has been identified with Shakespear, to practise the utmost frugality in London. 'When thou feelest thy purse well lined (the counsellor proceeded), buy thee some place or lordship in the country that, growing weary of playing, thy money may there bring thee to dignitie and reputation.' It was this prosaic course of conduct that Shakespear followed. As soon as his position in his profession was assured, he devoted his energies to re-establishing the fallen fortunes of his family in his native place, and to acquiring for himself and his successors the status of gentlefolk.

His father's pecuniary embarrassments had steadily increased since his son's departure. Creditors harassed him unceasingly. In 1687 one Nicholas Lane pursued him for a debt for which he had become liable as surety for his brother Henry. Through 1588 and Shakespear's practical temperament.

His father's difficulties.

1589 he retaliated with pertinacity on a debtor named John Tompson. But in 1591 a creditor, Adrian Quiney, obtained a writ of dstraint against him, and although in 1592 he attested inventories taken on the death of two neighbours, Ralph Shaw and Henry Field, father of the printer, he was on 25 Dec. of the same year 'presented' as a recusant for absenting himself from church. The commissioners reported that his absence was probably due to 'fear of process for debt.' He figures for the last time in the proceedings of the local court, in his customary rôle of defendant, in March 1595, and there is every indication that in that year he retired from trade, vanquished at every point. In January 1596-7 he conveyed a slip of land attached to his dwelling in Henley Street to one George Badger. There is a likelihood that the poet's wife fared, in the poet's absence, no better. The only contemporary mention made of her between her marriage in 1582 and her husband's death in 1610 is as the borrower at an unascertained date (doubtless before 1595) of forty shillings from Thomas Whittington, who had formerly been her father's shepherd. The money was unpaid when Whittington died in 1601, and he directed his executor to recover the sum from the poet and distribute it among the poor of Stratford (HALLIWELL-PHILLIPS, ii. 180).

His wife's
debt.

It was probably in 1596 that Shakespeare returned, after nearly eleven years' absence, to his native town, and worked a revolution in the affairs of his family. The prosecutions of his father in the local court then ceased. Thenceforth the poet's relations with Stratford were uninterrupted. He still resided in London for most of the year; but until the close of his professional career he paid the town at least one annual visit, and he was always formally described as 'of Stratford-on-Avon, gentleman.' He was no doubt there on 11 Aug. 1596, when his only son, Hamnet, was buried in the parish church; the boy was eleven and a half years old.

Two months later the bankrupt father, took a step, by way of regaining his prestige which must be assigned to his son's intervention. On 20 Oct. 1596 John Shakespeare applied for a coat-of-arms in consideration, it was stated in the first draft-grant, of the services of his ancestors to Henry VII, and of his having married Mary Arden. A second copy of the draft altered 'ancestors' to 'grand-father.' The application does not seem to have been persisted in (cf. Miscellaneous Genealogia et Heraldica, 2nd ser. 1896, i. 109).

The coat-of-arms.

A new grant was drafted by the college of arms three years later, when it was alleged that a coat-of-arms had been assigned to John while he was bailiff of Stratford. In the draft of 1599 greater emphasis was laid on the gentle descent of Shakespeare's mother, the arms of whose family her children were authorised to quarter with their own. But this draft, like the first, remained unconfirmed. The father's arms were described as 'gold on a bend sable a spear of the first, the point steeled proper, and for his crest or cognisance, a falcon his wings displayed argent standing on a wreath of his colour: supporting a spear gold steeled as aforesaid: set upon a helmet with mantels and tassels.' In the margin of the first draft a pen sketch is given, with the motto 'Non sanz droict'; in the draft of 1599 the arms both of Shakespeare and of the Arden family are very roughly tricked (Herald and Genealogist, i. 510; HALLIWELL-PHILLIPS, ii. 58, 60). Two copies of the draft of 1596 and one of that of 1599 are at the college of arms. Although no evidence survives to show that the poet used the arms personally, they are prominently displayed on his tomb; they appear on the seal and tomb of his elder daughter Susanna, impaled with those of her husband; and they were quartered by Thomas Nash, the first husband of the poet's granddaughter, Elizabeth Hall (FRENCH, Genealogica Shakespeareana, p. 418).

In 1597 the poet took in his own person a more effective step in the way of rehabilitating himself and his family in the eyes of his fellow townsmen. On 4 May he purchased the largest house in the town, known as New Place. It had been built by Sir Hugh Clopton [q.v.] more than a century before, and seems to have fallen into a ruinous condition. But Shakespeare paid for it, with two barns and two gardens, the then substantial sum of 60*l*. Owing to the sudden death of the vendor, William Underhill, on 7 July 1597, the original transfer of the property was left at the time incomplete. Underhill's son Fulk died a felon, and he was succeeded in the family estates by his brother Hercules, who on coming of age, May 1602, completed in a new deed the transfer of New Place to Shakespeare (Notes and Queries, 8th ser. v. 478). On 4 Feb. 1597-8 Shakespeare was described as a householder in Chapel Street ward, in which New Place was situated, and as the owner of ten quarters of corn. The inventory was made owing to the presence of famine in the town, and very few inhabitants were credited with a larger holding. In the same year (1598) he procured stone for the repair of the house, and before 1602 had planted a fruit orchard. He is traditionally said to have interested himself in the garden, and to have planted (after 1609) with his own hands a mulberry tree, which was long a prominent feature of it. When this was cut down, in 1758, numerous relics were made from it, and were treated with an almost superstitious veneration (HALLIWELL-PHILLIPS, i. 411-16). Shakespeare does not appear to have permanently settled at New Place till 1611. In 1609 the house, or part of it, was occupied by the town clerk, Thomas Greene, 'alias Shakespeare,' who claimed to be the poet's cousin. His grandmother seems to have been a Shakespeare. He often acted as the poet's legal adviser.

Purchase of
New Place.

It was doubtless under Shakespeare's guidance that his father and mother set on foot in November 1597—six months after the acquisition of New Place—a lawsuit against John Lambert for the recovery of the mortgaged estate of Ashby in Wilmcote. The litigation dragged on for some years without result. Three letters written during 1598 by leading men at Stratford are still extant among the corporation's archives, and leave no doubt of the reputation for wealth and influence with which the purchase of New Place invested the poet in his fellow-townsmen's eyes. Abraham Sturley, who was once bailiff, writing early in 1598, apparently to a brother in London, says: 'This is one special remembrance from our father's motion.

It seemeth by him that our countryman, Mr. Shaksper, is willing to disburse some money upon some odd yardland or other at Shottery, or near about us: he thinketh it a very fit pattern to move him to deal in the matter of our tithes. By the instructions you can give him thereof, and by the friends he can make therefor, we think it a fair mark for him to shoot at, and would do us much good.' Richard Quiney, another townsman, father of Thomas (afterwards one of Shakespeare's two sons-in-law), was, in the autumn of the same year, harassed by debt, and on 26 Oct. appealed to Shakespeare for a loan of money. 'Loving countryman,' the application ran, 'I am bold of you as of a friend craving your help with xxx*li*.' Quiney was staying at the Bell in Carter Lane, London, and his main business in the metropolis was to procure exemption for the town of Stratford from the payment of a subsidy. Abraham Sturley pointed out to him in a letter dated 4 Nov. 1598 that since the town was wholly unable, in consequence of the dearth of corn, to pay the tax, he hoped 'that our countryman, Mr.

Wm. Shak., would procure us money, which I will like of, as I shall hear when, and where, and how.'

The financial prosperity, to which this correspondence and the transactions immediately preceding it point, has been treated as one of the chief mysteries of Shakespeare's career, but the difficulties have been exaggerated. It was not until 1599, when the Globe Theatre was built, that he acquired any share in the profits of a playhouse. But his revenues as a successful dramatist and actor were by no means contemptible at an earlier date. His gains in the capacity of dramatist were certainly small. The highest price known to have been paid to an author for a play by an acting company was 10*l*.; 6*l*. was the ordinary rate. (In order to compare the sums mentioned here with the present currency, they should be multiplied by ten.) The publication of a play produced no profit for the author. The nineteen plays which may be set to Shakespeare's credit between 1591 and 1599 cannot consequently have brought him more than 150*l*., or some 17*l*. a year. But as an actor his income was far larger. An efficient actor received in 1635 as large a regular salary as 180*l*.. The lowest known valuation set an actor's wages at 3*s*. a day, or about 45*l*. a year. Shakespeare's emoluments as an actor in 1599 are not likely to have fallen below 100*l*.: while the remuneration due to performances at court or in noblemen's houses, if the accounts of 1594 be accepted as the basis of reckoning, added some 16*l*.. Shakespeare's friendly relations, too, with the printer Field, secured him, despite the absence of any copyright law, some part of the profits in the large and continuous sale of his poems. Thus over 130*l*. (equal to 1,300*l*. of to-day) would be Shakespeare's average annual revenue before 1599. Such a sum would be regarded as a substantial income in a country town. According to the author of 'Ratseis Ghost,' Shakespeare practised in London a strict frugality, and there seems no reason why he should not have been able in 1597 to draw from his savings 60*l*. wherewith to buy New Place. Whether his income or savings wholly justified his fellow-townsmen's opinion of his wealth in 1598, or sufficed between 1597 and 1599 to meet his expenses, in rebuilding the house, stocking the barns with grain, and in various legal proceedings, may be questioned. According to tradition, Southampton gave him a large gift of money to enable him 'to go through with' a purchase to which he had a mind. A munificent gift, added to professional gains, would amply account

Appeals for and from his fellow-townsmen.

Financial position
before 1599.

for Shakespeare's financial position before 1599.

After 1599 his sources of income from the theatre greatly increased. In 1635 the heirs of the actor Richard Burbage were engaged in litigation respecting their proprietary rights in the two playhouses, the Globe and the Blackfriars theatres. The documents relating to this litigation supply authentic, although not very detailed, information of Shakespeare's interest in theatrical property. Richard Burbage, with his brother Cuthbert, erected at their sole cost the Globe Theatre in the winter of 1598-9, and the Blackfriars, which their father was building at the time of his death in 1597, was also their property. After completing the Globe they leased out, for twenty-one years, shares in the receipts to 'those deserving men Shakespeare, Hemings, Condell, Philips, and others.' All the shareholders named were, like Burbage, active members of Shakespeare's company of players. The shares, which numbered sixteen in all, carried with them the obligation of providing for the expenses of the playhouse, and were doubtless in the first instance freely bestowed. Hamlet claims, in the play scene (III. ii. 293), that the success of his improvised tragedy would 'get him a fellowship in a cry of players'—a proof that a successful dramatist might reasonably expect such a reward for a conspicuous effort. How many shares originally fell to Shakespeare there is no means of determining. Records of later subdivisions suggest that they did not exceed two. But the Globe was an exceptionally popular playhouse, and its receipts were large. In 'Hamlet' both a share and a half-share of 'a fellowship in a cry of players' are described as assets of enviable value (III. ii. 294-6). According to the documents of 1635, an actor-sharer at the Globe received above 200*l.* a year on each share, besides his actor's salary of 180*l.* Thus Shakespeare drew from the Globe Theatre, at the lowest estimate, more than 500*l.* a year in all. His interest in the Blackfriars Theatre was comparatively unimportant, and is less easy to estimate. The often quoted documents on which Collier depended to prove him a substantial shareholder in that playhouse have been long proved to be forgeries. The pleas in the lawsuit of 1635 show that the Burbages, the owners, leased the Blackfriars Theatre after its establishment in 1597 for a long term of years to the master of the children of the chapel, but bought out the lessee at the end of 1609, and then 'placed' in it 'men-players which were Hemings, Condell, Shakespeare, &c.' To these and other actors they allotted shares in the receipts, the shares numbering eight in all. The profits were far smaller than at the Globe, and if Shakespeare held one share (certainly on the point is impossible), it added not more than 100*l.* a year to his income, and that not until 1610.

His remuneration as dramatist for the seventeen plays completed between 1599 and 1611 may be estimated, in consideration of their exceptional popularity, at 170*l.* or some 15*l.* a year, while the increase in the number of court performances under James I, and the additional favour bestowed on Shakespeare's company, may well have given that source of income the enhanced value of 20*l.* a year. With an annual professional income reaching near 600*l.* a year, Shakespeare could easily, with good management, have completed those purchases of houses and land at Stratford on which he laid out a total sum of 970*l.* between 1599 and 1613, or an annual average of 70*l.* These properties, it must be remembered, represented investments, and he drew rent from most of them. He traded, too, in agricultural produce. There is nothing inherently improbable in the statement of John Ward, the seventeenth-century vicar of Stratford, that in his last years 'he spent at the rate of a thousand a year, as I have heard,' although we may reasonably make allowance for exaggeration in the round figures. Shakespeare realised his theatrical shares several years before his death in 1616, when he left, according to his will, 950*l.* in money in addition to his real estate and personal belongings. His friends and fellow-actors, Hemings and Condell, amassed equally large, if not larger, fortunes, while a contemporary theatrical proprietor, Edward Alleyn, purchased the manor of Dulwich for 10,000*l.* (in money of his own day), and devoted it, with much other property, to public uses, at the same time as he made ample provision for his family out of the residue of his estate. Gifts from patrons may have continued to occasionally augment Shakespeare's resources, but his wealth can be satisfactorily assigned to better attested agencies. There is no ground for treating it as of mysterious origin (cf. HALLIWELL-PHILLIPS, i. 512-19; FLEAY, Stage, pp. 324-8).

Between 1599 and 1611, while London remained Shakespeare's chief home, he built up his estate at Stratford. In 1601 his father died, being buried on 8 Sept. He apparently left no will, and the poet, as the eldest son, inherited the houses in Henley Street, the only portion of the elder Shakespeare's or his wife's property which had not been alienated to creditors. Shakespeare permitted his mother to reside in one of the Henley Street houses till her death (she was buried 9 Sept. 1608), and he derived a modest rent from the other. On 1 May 1602 he purchased of the rich landowners William and John Combe of Stratford, for 320*l.*, 107 acres of arable land near the town. The conveyance was delivered, in the poet's absence, to his brother Gilbert, 'to the use of the within named William Shakespears' (HALLIWELL-PHILLIPPS, ii. 17-19). A third purchase quickly followed. On 28 Sept. 1602, at a court baron of the manor of Rowington, one Walter Getley transferred to the poet a cottage and garden which were situated at Chapel Lane, opposite the lower grounds of New Place. They were held practically in fee-simple at the annual rental of 2*s.* 6*d.* It appears from the roll that Shakespeare did not attend the manorial court then held at Rowington, and it was stipulated that the estate should remain in the hands of the lady of the manor until he completed the purchase in person. At a later period he was admitted to the copyhold, and he settled the remainder on his two daughters in fee. In April 1610 he purchased from the Combes 20 acres of pasture land, to add to the 107 of arable land that he had acquired of the same owners in 1602.

As early as 1598 Abraham Sturley had suggested that Shakespeare should purchase the tithes of Stratford. Seven years later he became their part owner, and thus conspicuously extended his local influence. On 24 July 1606 he bought for 440*l.* of Ralph Huband an unexpired term of thirty-one years of a ninety-two years' lease of a moiety of the tithes of Stratford, Old Stratford, Bishopton, and Welcombe. The moiety was subject to a rent of 17*l.* to the corporation, who were the reversionary owners on the lease's expiration, and of 6*l.* to John Barker, the heir of a former proprietor. The investment brought Shakespeare, under the most favourable circumstances, a net income of 38*l.* a year, and the refusal of persons who claimed an interest in the other moiety to acknowledge the full extent of their liability to the corporation led that body to demand from the poet payments justly due from others. After 1609 he joined with two interested persons, Richard Lane of Awston and Thomas Greene, the town clerk of Stratford, in a suit in chancery to determine the exact responsibilities of all the title-owners, and in 1612 they presented a bill of complaint to Lord-chancellor Ellesmere, with what result is unknown.

Shakespeare inherited his father's love of litigation, and stood rigorously by his rights.

In March 1600 he recovered in London a debt of 7*l.* from one John Clayton. In July 1604, in the local court at Stratford, he sued one Philip Rogers, to whom he had supplied since the preceding March malt to the value of 1*l.* 19*s.* 10*d.*, and had on 25 June lent 2*s.* in cash. Rogers paid back 6*s.*, and Shakespeare sought the balance of the account, 1*l.* 15*s.* 10*d.* During 1603 and 1609 he was at law with another fellow-townsmen, John Addenbroke. On 15 Feb. 1609 Shakespeare, who was apparently represented by Thomas Greene, obtained judgment from a jury against Addenbroke for the payment of 6*l.*, and 1*l.* 5*s.* costs, but Addenbroke left the town, and the triumph proved barren. Shakespeare avenged himself by proceeding against one Thomas Horneby, who had acted as the absconding debtor's bail (HALLIWELL-PHILLIPPS, ii. 77-80).

With an inconsistency that is more apparent than real, the astute business transactions of these years (1607-1611) synchronise with the production of Shakespeare's noblest literary work—of his most sustained and serious efforts in comedy, tragedy, and romance. In 1599, after abandoning English history in 'Henry V,' he produced in rapid succession his three most perfect essays in comedy—'Much Ado about Nothing,' 'As you like it,' and 'Twelfth Night.' Their good-humoured tone seems to reveal their author in his happiest frame of mind; in each the gaiety and tenderness of youthful womanhood are exhibited in fascinating union; while Shakespeare rarely put his lyric gift to better advantage than in the songs with which the three plays are interspersed. The first two were entered on the 'Stationers' Register' before 4 Aug. 1600, on which day a prohibition was set on their publication, as well as on the publication of 'Henry V.' and Jonson's 'Every Man in his Humour.' Probably the acting company found the publication of plays injurious to their rights in them, and sought to stop the practice. Nevertheless, 'Much Ado,' like 'Henry V.' was published before the close of the year. 'As you like it,' like 'Twelfth Night,' was not printed till it appeared in the folio.

In 'Much Ado,' which appears to have been written in 1609, the brilliant comedy of Benedick and Beatrice, and of the blundering watchmen Dogberry and Verges, is wholly original; but the sombre story of Hero and Claudio with which it is entwined 'Much Ado' is drawn from an Italian source, either from Bandello (Novel, xxii.) through Belleforest's 'Histoires Tragiques,' or from Ariosto's 'Orlando Furioso' through Sir John Harrington's translation (canto v.) 'As you like it,' which quickly followed, is a dramatic adaptation of Lodge's romance, 'Rosalynde, Euphues Golden Legacie' (1590), but Shakespeare added three new characters of first-rate interest—Jaques the meditative cynic, the fool Touchstone, and the hoyden Audrey. The date of 'Twelfth Night' is probably 1600. Steevens supposed that 'the new map with the augmentation of the Indies,' spoken of by Maria (act iii. sc. ii. l. 86), had reference to the map in Linschoten's 'Voyages,' 1598. Like the 'Comedy of Errors,' 'Twelfth Night' first achieved general notice through a presentation before barristers. It was produced at Middle Temple Hall on 2 Feb. 1601–2, and Manningham, a barrister who was present, described the performance (Diary, Camden Soc. p. 18; the Elizabethan Stage Society repeated the play on the same stage on 10, 11, and 12 Feb. 1897). Manningham wrote that the piece was 'much like the "Comedy of Errors" or "Menecmi" in Plautus, but most like and neerer to that in Italian called "Inganni." Two Italian playe entitled 'Gl' Inganni' ('The Cheats'), and a third called 'Gl' Ingannati,' present resemblances to 'Twelfth Night'; but it is doubtful if Shakespeare had recourse to any of them. Shakespeare drew the story from the 'Historie of Apolonius and Silla' in 'Riche his Farewell to Militarie Profession' (1581), an English rendering of a tale in Cinthio's 'Hecatommitlii.' The characters of Malvolio, Sir Toby Belch, Sir Andrew Aguecheek, Fabian, the clown Feste, and Maria, who lighten the romantic pathos with their mirth, are Shakespeare's own creations. The ludicrous gravity of Malvolio proved exceptionally popular on the stage.

1609-1611

In 1601 Shakespeare made a new departure. He first drew a plot from North's translation of 'Plutarch's Lives' (1579; 2nd edit. 1596). On Plutarch's lives of Julius Cæsar, Brutus, and Antony he based his historical tragedy of 'Julius Cæsar.' Weever, in 1601, in his 'Mirror of Martyrs,' plainly refers to the masterly speech allotted by Shakespeare to Antony, of which there is no suggestion in Plutarch; hence the date cannot be questioned. The general topic was already familiar on the stage (cf. Hamlet, act iii. sc. ii.

l. 108). A play of the same title was known as early as 1589, and was acted in 1594 by Shakespeare's company. Shakespeare's piece, which is a penetrating study of political life, is exceptionally well planned and balanced. The characters of Brutus, Antony, and Cæsar are exhibited with faultless art.

Meanwhile, Shakespeare's friend Ben Jonson was engaged in bitter warfare with his fellow-dramatists, Marston and Dekker, and in 1601 Jonson, in his 'Poetaster' (acted by the children of the chapel at the Blackfriars Theatre), effectively held his opponents up to ridicule, while they retorted in like fashion (cf. Fests, Shakespeare and Montaigne, 1884). Jonson figures personally in the 'Poetaster' under the name of Horace. Episodically he expresses approval of the work of another character, Virgil, in terms so closely resembling those which he is known to have applied to Shakespeare that they may be regarded as intended to apply to him (act v. sc. i.) Jonson points out that Virgil, by his penetrating intuition, achieved the great effect which others laboriously sought to reach through rules of art.

His learning labours not the school-like gloss
That most consists of echoing words and terms . . .

Nor any long or far-fetched circumstance—
Wrapt in the curious generalities of arts—
But a direct and analytic sum
Of all the worth and first effects of arts.
And for his poesy, 'tis so rammed with life
That it shall gather strength of life with being,
And live hereafter, more admired than now.

Shakespeare's attitude to Jonson's quarrel has given rise to various conjectures. In the same year (1601) 'The Return from Parnassus'—a third piece in a trilogy of plays—was 'acted by the students in St. John's College, Cambridge.' In this piece, as in its two predecessors, Shakespeare received, both as a playwright and a poet, high commendation, although his poems were judged to reflect somewhat too largely 'love's lazy foolish languishment.' In a prose dialogue between Shakespeare's fellow-actors Burbage and Kempe, which is a prominent feature of the 'Return,' Kempe remarks of university dramatists, 'Why, here's our fellow Shakespeare puts them all down; aye, and Ben Johnson, too. O! that Ben Johnson is a pestilent fellow. He brought up Horace, giving the poets a pill; but our fellow Shakespeare hath given him a purge that made him bewray his credit.' Burbage adds: 'He is a shrewd fellow, indeed.' A literal interpretation of this perplexing passage implies that Shakespeare took part against Jonson in his controversy with Dekker and his friends. But such a conclusion is otherwise uncorroborated. The general references subsequently made by Shakespeare (Hamlet, act ii. sc. ii. l. 354 seq.) to the interest taken by the public in a pending controversy between poets and players, and to the jealousy existing between men-actors and boy-actors, were doubtless suggested by Jonson's quarrel, but indicate that their author maintained a neutral attitude. Probably the 'purge' that Shakespeare was alleged to have given Jonson, who was perhaps in this instance credited with a jealousy in excess of the fact, meant no more than that Shakespeare had signally outstripped Jonson in popular esteem, possibly as the author of 'Julius Cæsar,' a subject peculiarly in Jonson's vein.

At any rate in 1602 Shakespeare finally left Jonson and all friends and foes lagging far behind. In that year he produced 'Hamlet,' with Burbage in the title-rôle. The story of the prince of Denmark had been popular on the stage in a lost dramatic version by another writer as early as 1589, and to that version Shakespeare's tragedy doubtless owed much. But the story was also accessible in the 'Histoires Tragiques' of Belleforest, who adapted it from the 'Historia Danica' of Saxo Grammaticus. An English translation of Belleforest's 'Hystorie of Hamlet' appeared in 1608 (cf. GERRICK and MAX MÖLKE, Hamlet-Quellen, Leipzig, 1881).

The bibliography of 'Hamlet' offers a puzzling problem. On 26 July 1602 'A Book called the Revenge of Hamlet, Prince of Denmark, as it was lately acted by the Lord Chamberlain his Servants,' was entered on the 'Stationers' Registers,' and it was published in quarto next year (for N[icholas] L[ing] and John Trundell). The title-page stated that it had been 'acted divers times in the city of London, as also in the two universities of Cambridge and Oxford and elsewhere.' In all probability this crude production was a piratical and carelessly transcribed copy of Shakespeare's first draft of the play, in which he drew largely on the older piece. A revised version appeared with the company's assent in 1604 as 'The Tragical History of Hamlet, Prince of Denmark, by William Shakespeare, newly imprinted and enlarged to almost as much again as it was, according to the true and perfect copy' (by James R[oberts] for N[icholas] L[ing]). The concluding words—'according to the true and perfect copy'—of the title-page of the second quarto stamp its predecessor as surreptitious. But the second quarto was itself printed from a copy which had been curtailed for acting purposes. A third version (long the textus receptus) figured in the folio of 1623. Here some passages, not to be found in the quartos, appear for the first time, but a few others that appear in the quartos are omitted. The folio text probably followed an acting copy which had been curtailed in a different fashion from that adopted in the second quarto (cf. Hamlet—parallel texts of the first and second quarto, and first folio—ed. Wilhelm Viëtor, Marburg, 1891; The Devonshire Hamlets, 1860, parallel texts of the two quartos; Hamlet, ed. George MacDonald, 1885, a study with the text of the folio).

Humorous relief is supplied to the tragic theme by Polonius and the gravediggers, and if the topical references to contemporary theatrical history (ii. ii. 350-89) could only count on an appreciative reception from an Elizabethan audience, the pungent censure of actors' perennial defects is calculated to catch the ear of the average playgoer of all ages. But 'Hamlet' is mainly a philosophical effort, a masterly study of this reflective temperament in excess. The action develops slowly; at times there is no movement at all. Except 'Antony and Cleopatra,' which exceeds it by sixty lines, the piece is the longest of Shakespeare's plays, while the total length of Hamlet's speeches far exceeds that of those allotted by Shakespeare to any others of his characters. Yet the interest excited by the character of the hero carries all before it, and amply accounts for the position of the play in popular esteem. 'Hamlet' was the only drama by Shakespeare that was acted in his lifetime at the two universities. Its popularity on the stage from its author's day to our own, when it is as warmly welcomed in the theatres of France and Germany as in those of England and America, lends signal testimony to the eminence of Shakespeare's dramatic instinct.

Although the difficulties of determining the date of 'Troilus and Cressida' are very great, there are many grounds for assigning its composition to the early days of 1608. In 1599 Dekker and Chetils were engaged by Henslowe to prepare for the Earl of Nottingham's company—a rival of Shakespeare's company—a play of 'Troilus and Cressida,' of which no trace survives. On 7 Feb. 1602-3 James Roberts obtained a license for 'the booke of Troilus and Cressida as yt is acted by my lord chamberlens men,' i.e. Shakespeare's company (ARBER, iii. 226). Roberts printed the second quarto of 'Hamlet' and others of 1602.

**Hamlet*,

The problem of its publication.

Popularity of 'Hamlet.'

Shakespeare's plays; but his effort to publish 'Troilus' proved abortive owing to the interposition of the players. The metrical characteristics—the regularity of the blank verse—powerfully confirm the date of composition which Roberts's license suggests. Six years later, however, on 28 Jan. 1608-9, a new license for the issue of 'a booke called the history of Troilus and Cressida' was granted to Richard Bonian and Henry Walley (ib. p. 400), and these publishers, more fortunate than Roberts, soon printed a quarto with Shakespeare's full name as author. In a bombastic advertisement, in which they paid high-flown compliments to the author as a writer of comedies, they defiantly boasted that the 'grand possessors'—i.e. the owners—of the play deprecated the publication, and they asserted, by way of enhancing the value of what were obviously stolen wares, that the piece was new and unacted. This statement was probably a commercial trick, rendered safe from immediate detection by the fact that the play had not been produced for six years. Perhaps, too, it was speciously justified by recent revisions which their edition embodied. At the time of publication a revival was in contemplation. Later in 1609 a second quarto appeared without the preliminary address, and bearing on the title-page the additional words, 'As it was acted by the king's majesty's servants at the Globe.'

The story was mainly drawn from Chaucer's 'Troilus and Cressida,' but Shakespeare seems also to have consulted Lydgate's 'Troy Book' and Chapman's translation of Homer's 'Iliad.' In defiance of his authorities, he invested with contemptible characteristics nearly all the Greek heroes who fought against Troy. Helen and Cressida are presented as heartless coquettes. In style the work is unequal, but in the speeches of Ulysses Shakespeare concentrates a mass of pithily expressed worldly wisdom, much of which has obtained proverbial currency.

Despite the association of Shakespeare's company with the rebellion of 1601, it retained its hold on court favour till the close of Elizabeth's reign, and as late as 2 Feb. 1608 entertained the dying queen at Richmond. Her death on 24 March 1608 drew from Shakespeare's early eulogist, Chettle, a vain appeal to him, under the fanciful name of Melicert, to Drop from his honied muse one sable tear,

To mourne her death that graced his desert,
And to his laies opened her royall eare (England's Mourning Garment, 1608, sign. D. 3). But the withdrawal of one royal patron only supplied Shakespeare and his friends with another, who proved even more liberal and appreciative. On 19 May 1603, very soon after James I's accession, a royal license was granted to Shakespeare and other actors 'freely to use and exercise the arte and facultie of playing comedies, tragedies, histories, enterludes, moralls, pastorals, stage-plaies, and such other like as they have already studied, or hereafter shall use or studie as well for the recreation of our loving subjectes as for our eolace and pleasure, when we shall thinke good to see them during our pleasure.' The Globe Theatre was noted as the customary scene of their labour, but permission was granted to them to perform in the town-hall or moot-hall of any country town. Ten actors are named. Lawrence

James I's patronage. Fletcher stands first on the list; he had already performed before James in Scotland in 1599 and 1601. Shakespeare comes second and Burbage third; the rest were doubtless all members of the lord chamberlain's company. The company was thenceforth styled the king's company, while its members became 'the king's servants.' Shakespeare's plays were repeatedly performed at court, and Oldys related that James wrote Shakespeare a letter in his own hand, which was at one time in the possession of Sir William D'Avenant, and afterwards, according to Lintot, in that of John Sheffield, duke of Buckingham. In December 1608 the company performed at Wilton while the king was on a visit to William Herbert, third earl of Pembroke. At the time the prevalence of the plague had led to the closing of the theatres in London, and James sent the king's players a gift of 30*l*. On 15 March 1604 the company walked from the Tower of London to Westminster in the procession which accompanied the king on his formal entry into London, and in August they were all summoned to attend at Somerset House on the occasion of the arrival there of the new Spanish ambassador, Juan de Taxis, Conde de Villa Mediana.

Under the incentive of such exalted patronage, Shakespeare's activity redoubled. To other causes must be assigned his absorption during the next six years in the highest themes of tragedy, and the intensity and energy which thenceforth illumined every scene that he contrived. To 1604 the composition of two of his greatest plays can be confidently assigned. 'Othello' was doubtless the first new piece by Shakespeare that was acted before James. It was produced at Whitehall on 1 Nov. 'Measure for Measure' sure' followed on 26 Dec. Neither was printed in Shakespeare's lifetime. 'Othello' was re-created from a painful story found in Cinthio's 'Hecatomithi' (decead iii. nov. 3), and not known to have been translated into English. The tragedy displays to magnificent advantage the dramatist's fully matured powers. An unfaltering equilibrium is maintained in the treatment of both plot and characters. The perilous story of 'Measure for Measure' also comes from Cinthio, who made it the subject not only of a romance, but of a tragedy called 'Epitia.' There is a likelihood that Shakespeare knew Cinthio's play, which was untranslated. The romance had been twice rendered into English by George Whetstone [q. v.]—in his play of 'Promos and Cassandra' (1578), and in his collection of prose tales, 'Heptameron of Civil Discourses' (1582). In 'Measure for Measure' Shakespeare treated with a solemnity that seems at times tinged by cynicism the corruption with which unchecked sexual passion threatens society. The duke's reference to his dislike of mobs, despite his love of his people, was perhaps penned in deference to James I, whose horror of crowds was notorious (act i. sc. i. 87-72).

Queen Elizabeth's death, 24 March 1603.

In 'Macbeth,' which Shakespeare began in 1605 and completed next year, he employed a setting wholly in harmony with the accession of a Scottish king. The story was drawn from Holinshed's 'Chronicle of Scottish History,' with occasional reference, perhaps, to earlier Scottish sources (cf. Athenaeum, 25 July 1896). The supernatural machinery of the three witches accorded with the king's superstitious faith in demonology; the dramatist lavished full sympathy on Banquo, James's ancestor; while Macbeth's vision of kings carrying 'twofold balls and treble sceptres' (iv. i. 20) plainly alludes to the union of Scotland with England and Ireland under James's sway. The allusion by the porter (act ii. sc. iii. 9) to the 'equivocator . . . who committed treason' was perhaps suggested by the defence of the doctrine of equivocation made by the jesuit Henry Garnett [q. v.], who was executed early in 1606 for his share in the 'gunpowder plot.' Much scenic elaboration characterised the production. Dr. Simon Forman [q. v.] witnessed a performance of the tragedy at the Globe in April 1611, and noted that Macbeth and Banquo entered the stage on horseback, and that Banquo's ghost was materially represented (act iii. sc. iv. 40 seq.). The characters of Macbeth and his wife are depicted with the utmost subtlety and concentrated insight. Nowhere, moreover, has Shakespeare introduced comic relief into a tragedy with bolder effect than in the porter's speech after the murder of Duncan (act ii. sc. iii. 1 seq.) The theory that this and a few other passages were from another hand does not merit acceptance (cf. Macbeth, ed. Clark and Wright, Clarendon Press Ser.) The resemblances between Thomas Middleton's 'Witch' and portions of 'Macbeth' may safely be ascribed to plagiarism on Middleton's part. Of two songs which, according to the stage directions, were to be sung in 'Macbeth' (act iii. sc. v. and act iv. sc. i.), only the first line of each is noted there, but songs beginning with the same lines are set out in full in Middleton's play; they were probably by Middleton, and were interpolated by actors in a stage version of 'Macbeth'; the piece was not printed until 1623.

'King Lear' was written during 1606, and was produced before the court at Whitehall on the night of 26 Dec. of that year. It was entered on the 'Stationers' Registers' on 26 Nov. 1607, and two editions, published by Nathaniel Butter, appeared in the following year; neither exactly corresponds with the other or with the accepted text of the folio. Like 'Macbeth,' it was mainly founded on Holinshed's 'Chronicle.' The leading theme had been dramatised as early as 1593, but Shakespeare's attention was no doubt directed to it by the publication of an adaptation of Holinshed's version in 1605 under the title of 'The True Chronicle History of King Leir and his three Daughters—Gonorill, Ragan, and Cordelia.' Shakespeare did not adhere closely to his

He invested the tale of Lear with a hopelessly tragic conclusion, and on it he grafted the equally distressing tale of Gloucester and his two sons, which he drew from Sidney's 'Arcadia.' Hints for the speeches of Edgar when feigning madness were drawn from Harsnet's 'Declaration of Popish Impostures,' 1608. In 'Lear' the pity and terror of which tragedy is capable reach their climax. The agony—the living martyrdom—springing from filial ingratitude is unrelieved at any point. The faithful fool who attends the king jests sadly, and serves to intensify the pathos.

Although Shakespeare's powers showed no sign of exhaustion, he reverted next year (1607) to his earlier habit of collaboration, and with another's aid composed two dramas—'Timon of Athens' and 'Pericles.' An extant play on the subject of 'Timon of Athens' was composed in 1600 (edited from the manuscript by Dyce in 1842), but there is nothing to show that Shakespeare and his coadjutor were acquainted with it. They doubtless derived a part of their story from Painter's 'Palace of Pleasure,' and this rest from Plutarch's 'Life of Marc Antony,' and perhaps a dialogue of Lucian entitled 'Timon,' which Bolardo had previously converted into a comedy under the name of 'Il Timone.' Internal evidence makes it clear that Shakespeare's coadjutor was responsible for nearly the whole of acts iii. and v. But the character of Timon himself and all the scenes which he dominates are from Shakespeare's pen. Timon is cast in the mould of Lear.

There seems some ground for the belief that Shakespeare's coadjutor in 'Timon' was George Wilkins [q. v.], who, in 'The Miser's Enforced Marriage' (1607), first treated the story that afterwards served for the plot of 'The Yorkshire Tragedy.' At any rate,

Wilkins may safely be credited with portions of 'Pericles,' a romantic play which can be referred to the same year as 'Timon.' Shakespeare contributed only acts iii. and v. and parts of iv., which together form a self-contained whole, and do not combine satisfactorily with the remaining scenes. The presence of a third hand, of even inferior merit to Wilkins, has been suspected, and to this collaborator (perhaps William Rowley) may be best assigned the three scenes of purposeless coarseness which take place in or before a brothel (iv. 2, 6, and 6). From so distributed a responsibility this piece naturally suffers. It lacks homogeneity, and the story is helped out by dumb shows and prologues. But a matured felicity of expression characterises Shakespeare's own contributions, which charmingly narrate the romantic quest of Pericles for his daughter Marina, who was born and abandoned in a shipwreck. At many points he here anticipated his latest dramatic effects. The shipwreck is depicted (act iv. 1) as impressively as in the 'Tempest,' and Marina and her mother Thaisa enjoy many experiences in common with Perdita and Hermione in the 'Winter's Tale.' The prologues, which were not by Shakespeare, were spoken by an actor representing the medieval poet John Gower, who versified the story under the title of 'Apollonius of Tyre' in his 'Confessio Amantis.' It is also found in a prose translation (from the French), which was printed in Lawrence Twyn's 'Patterne of Painfull Adventures' in 1576, and again in 1607. After the play was produced George Wilkins, one of the alleged coadjutors, based on it a novel called 'The Painfull Adventures of Pericles, Prince of Tyre, being the True History of the Play of Pericles as it was lately presented by the worthy and ancient Poet, John Gower' (1608). The play was issued as by William Shakespeare in a mangling form in 1608, and again in 1611, 1619, 1630, and 1685. It was not included in Shakespeare's collected works till 1664.

In May 1608 Edward Blount [q. v.] entered in the 'Stationers' Registers,' by the authority of Sir George Buc, the licenser of plays, 'a booke called "Antony and Cleopatra." "Anthony and Cleopatra." No copy of this date is known, and once again the company probably hindered the publication. It was first printed in the folio of 1623. The source of the play is the life of Antonius in North's 'Plutarch,' and Shakespeare closely followed the historical narrative. But he breathed into the characters even more than his wonted fire, and invested the whole theme with a dramatic grandeur which lifts even Cleopatra's moral worthlessness into sublimity. The 'happy valiancy' of the style, too—to use Coleridge's admirable phrase—sets the tragedy very near the zenith of his achievement.

'Coriolanus' (first printed in 1623) similarly owes its origin to North's 'Plutarch,' although Shakespeare may have read the story in Painter's 'Palace of Pleasure' (No. iv.) He adhered to the text of Plutarch with the utmost literalness. The metrical characteristics prove the play to have been written at the same period, probably in the same year as 'Antony and Cleopatra' (1608). In its austere temper it contrasts at all points with its predecessor. The courageous self-reliance of Coriolanus's mother, Volumentia, is severely contrasted with the submissive gentleness of Virgilia, Coriolanus's wife. The hero falls a victim to unchecked pride of caste, but for the rabble, who procure Coriolanus's overthrow, Shakespeare shows ironical contempt.

In 'Cymbeline,' 'Winter's Tale,' and 'The Tempest,' the three latest plays that came from Shakespeare's unaided pen, he dealt with romantic themes which all end happily, but he instilled into them a pathos which sets them in a category of their own apart from comedy and tragedy. The placidity of tone conspicuous in these three plays has been often contrasted with the storm and stress of the great tragedies that preceded them. But the commonly accepted theory that traces in this change of tone a corresponding development in the author's own emotions ignores the objectivity of Shakespeare's dramatic work. Every phase of feeling lay within the scope of his intuition, and the successive order in which he approached them bore no explicable relation to the course of his private life or experience.

In 'Cymbeline' he freely adapted a fragment of British history taken from Holinshed, interweaving with it a story 'Cymbeline' from Boccaccio's 'Decameron' (Novel ix. Day 2). The Ginevra of the Italian novel corresponds to Shakespeare's Imogen. Her story is also told in a tract called 'Westward for Smelts,' no edition of which earlier than 1620 is now known, although Steevens and Malone doubtfully assume that it was first published in 1603, and that it had been already laid under contribution by Shakespeare in the 'Merry Wives.' Dr. Forman saw 'Cymbeline' acted either in 1610 or 1611. On Imogen Shakespeare lavished all the fascination of his genius. The play contains the splendid lyric 'Fear no more the heat of the sun' (act iv. sc. ii. 258 seq.) The poor verse of the vision of Posthumus (act v. sc. iv. lines 30 seq.) must have been supplied by another hand.

'A Winter's Tale' was seen by Dr. Forman at the Globe on 15 May 1611. It is based upon Greene's popular romance which was called 'Pandosto' in the first edition of 1588, and subsequently 'Dorastus and Fawnia.'

Shakespeare followed Greene in allotting a sea-shore to Bohemia—an error over which Ben Jonson, like many later critics, made merry (Conversations with Drummond, p. 16). But Shakespeare created the thievish pedlar Autolycus and the high-spirited Paulina, and invented the reconciliation of Leontes with Hermione. In Perdita, Florizel, and the boy Mamilius, he depicted youth in its most attractive guise. The freshness of the pastoral incident, too, surpasses that of all his presentations of country life.

'The Tempest' was probably the latest drama that he completed. In the summer of 1609, when a fleet, under the command of Sir George Somers [q. v.], had been overtaken by a storm off the West Indies, the admiral's ship, the 'Sea-Venture,' was driven on the Bermuda coast. The crew, escaping in two boats of cedar to Virginia, reached England in 1610. An account of the wreck, entitled 'A Discovery of the Bermudas, otherwise called the Ile of Divels,' was written by Sylvester Jourdain or Jourdan [q. v.], one of the survivors, and published in October 1610. Shakespeare, who mentions the 'still vexed Bermoothes' (act i. sc. i. l. 229), incorporated in 'The Tempest' many hints from Jourdain. No source for this complete plot has been discovered, but the German writer, Jacob Ayser, who died in 1605, dramatised a somewhat similar story in 'Die schöne Sidsa,' where the adventures of Prospero, Ferdinand, Ariel, and Miranda are roughly anticipated (printed in COHN). English actors were performing at Nuremberg, where Ayser lived, in 1604 and 1606, and may have brought reports of this piece to Shakespeare. Or perhaps both English and German plays had a common origin in some novel that has not yet been traced. Gonzalo's description of an ideal commonwealth is derived from Florio's translation of Montaigne's essays (1603). A highly ingenious theory represents 'The Tempest' (which, excepting 'Macbeth' and the 'Two Gentlemen,' is the shortest of Shakespeare's plays) as a masque written to celebrate the marriage of Princess Elizabeth (like Miranda, an island-princess) with the Elector Frederick. This marriage took place on 14 Feb. 1612-13, a very late date to which to assign the composition of the piece. The plot, which revolves about the forcible expulsion of a ruler from his dominions, and his daughter's wooing by the son of the usurper's chief ally, is hardly one that a shrewd playwright would have chosen as the setting of an official epithalamium in honour of the daughter of a monarch so sensitive about his title to the crown as James I (cf. Universal Review, April 1889, by Dr. R. Garnett).

Although Shakespeare gives as free a rein to his imagination in the 'Tempest' as in 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' and magical or supernatural agencies are the mainsprings of the plot, the tone is so solemn and impressive that critics may be forgiven if they detect in it something more than the irresponsible play of poetic fancy. Many of the characters seem the outcome of speculation respecting the least soluble problems of human existence. Ariel appears to suggest the capabilities of human intellect when detached from physical attributes. Caliban seems to typify human nature before the evolution of moral sentiment (cf. DANIEL WILSON, Caliban, or the Missing Link; REXAN, Caliban: a Drama; BROWNING, Caliban upon Setebos). In Prospero, the guiding providence of the romance, who resigns his magic power in the closing scene, traces have been sought without much reason of the lineaments of the dramatist himself, who in this play probably bade farewell to the enchanted work of his life.

But if in 1611 Shakespeare finally abandoned dramatic composition, there seems little doubt that he left with the manager of his company unfinished drafts of more than one play which others were summoned at a later date to complete. His place at the head of the active dramatists was at once filled by John Fletcher (1579-1625) [q. v.], and Unfinished plays.

Fletcher, with some aid possibly from his friend Philip Massinger [q. v.], probably undertook the working up of Shakespeare's unfinished sketches. On 9 Sept. 1658 the publisher Humphrey Moseley [q. v.] obtained a license for the publication of a play which he described as 'History of Cardenio, by Fletcher and Shakespeare.' It was probably identical with the lost play, 'Cardano,' which was acted at court in 1618. Moseley, whose description may have been fraudulent, failed to publish the piece, and nothing is otherwise known of it. Two other pieces, 'Two Noble Kinsmen' and 'The Two Noble Kinsmen' and 'Henry VIII,' which are attributed to similar authorship, survive.

'The Two Noble Kinsmen' was first printed in 1634, and was written, according to the title-page, 'by the memorable worthies of their time, Mr. John Fletcher and Mr. William Shakespeare, gentlemen.' It was included in the folio of Beaumont and Fletcher of 1679. On grounds alike of æsthetic criticism and metrical tests, a substantial portion of the play was assigned to Shakespeare by Charles Lamb, Coleridge, and Dyce. The last included it in his edition of Shakespeare. Coleridge detected Shakespeare's hand in act i. sc. i., and act iii. sc. i. and ii. Act iv. sc. iii., and act v. (except sc. ii.) were subsequently set to his credit (SPALDING, Shakespeare's Authorship of Two Noble Kinsmen, 1883, reprinted by New Shakspeare Society, 1876; SPALDING in 'Edinburgh Review,' 1847; 'Transactions' New Shakspeare Soc. 1874; 'Two Noble Kinsmen,' ed. Little-dale). All these passages develop the main plot, which is drawn from Chaucer's 'Knight's Tale of Palamon and Arcite,' and seems to have been twice dramatised previously—in a lost play, 'Palamon and Arcyte,' by Richard Edwardes [q. v.], which was acted at court in 1566, and in a second piece, called 'Palamon and Arsett' (also lost), which was purchased by Henslowe in 1594. The residue is disfigured by indecency and triviality, and is of no literary value. Some recent critics assign much of the alleged Shakespearian work to Massinger, and they narrow Shakespeare's contribution to the first scene (with the opening song) and act v. sc. i. and iv. (cf. Mr. ROBERT BOYD in 'Transactions' of the New Shakspeare Soc. 1882). Certainty is impossible, but frequent signs of Shakespeare's workmanship are unmistakable.

Similar perplexity attends an examination of 'Henry VIII.' It was in course of performance at the Globe Theatre on 29 June 1613, when the firing of some cannon incidental to the performance set fire to the playhouse, which was burned down; it was rebuilt next year (cf. Court and Times of James I.). Sir Henry Wotton, describing the disaster on 6 July, entitled the piece 'All is True representing some principal pieces in the Reign of Henry VIII.' The play is loosely constructed, and the last act ill coheres with its predecessors. The whole resembles an 'historical masque.' It was first printed in the folio of Shakespeare's works in 1623, but shows traces of more hands than one. The three chief characters—the king, Queen Katharine of Arragon, and Cardinal Wolsey—bear clear marks of Shakespeare's best workmanship; but only act i. sc. i., act ii. sc. iii. and iv. (Katharine's trial), act iii. sc. ii. (except ll. 204–460), act v. sc. i., can on either æsthetic or metrical grounds be assigned to him. These portions may, according to their metrical characteristics, be dated, like the 'Winter's Tale,' about 1611. The remaining thirteen scenes are from the pen of Fletcher, perhaps with occasional aid from Massinger. Wolsey's familiar farewell to Cromwell (act iii. sc. ii. ll. 204–460) is undoubtedly by Fletcher. James Spedding's theory that Fletcher hastily completed Shakespeare's unfinished draft for the special purpose of enabling the company to celebrate the marriage of Princess Elizabeth and Elector Palatine, which took place on 14 Feb. 1612–13, seems fanciful. During May 1613, according to an extant list, twenty plays were produced at court in honour of the event, but 'Henry VIII.' is not among them (Bodl. MS. Rawl. A 289; cf. SPEDDING in Gent. Mag. 1850, reprinted in New Shakspeare Soc. 'Transactions,' 1874). The conjecture that Massinger and Fletcher alone collaborated in 'Henry VIII.' (to the exclusion of Shakespeare altogether) rests on equally doubtful premisses (cf. Mr. ROBERT BOYD in New Shakspeare Society 'Transactions,' 1884).

The concluding years of Shakespeare's life (1611–1616) were mainly passed at Stratford, and probably in 1611 he disposed of his share in the Globe and Blackfriars theatres. He owned none at the date of his death. But until 1614 he paid frequent visits to London, where friends in sympathy with his work were alone to be found. His plays continued to form the staple of court performances. In May 1613, during the Princess Elizabeth's marriage festivities, Heming, Shakespeare's former colleague, produced at Whitehall no less than seven of his plays, viz. 'Much Ado,' 'Tempest,' 'Winter's Tale,' 'Sir John Falstaff' (i.e. 'Merry Wives'), 'Othello,'

Plays at court in 1613.

'Julius Cæsar,' and 'Hotspur' (doubtless '1 Henry IV') (HALLIWELL-PHILLIPS, ii. 87). Of his actor-friends, one of the chief, Augustine Phillips, died in 1605, leaving by will 'to my fellowe, William Shakespeare, a thirty-shillings piece of gold.' With Burbage, Heming, and Condell his relations remained close to the end. Burbage and he were credited with having engaged together in many sportive adventures. The sole anecdote of Shakespeare recorded in his lifetime relates that Burbage, when playing Richard III, agreed with a lady in the audience to visit her after the performance; Shakespeare, overhearing the conversation, anticipated the actor's visit, and met Burbage on his arrival with the quip that 'William the Conqueror was before Richard the Third' (MANNINGHAM, Diary, 18 March 1601, Camd. Soc. p. 39). Such gossip deserves little more acceptance than the later story, in the same key, which credits Shakespeare with the paternity of Sir William D'Avenant [q. v.] The latter was baptised at Oxford on 3 March 1605, as the son of John D'Avenant, the landlord of the Crown Inn, where Shakespeare lodged in his journeys to and from Stratford. The story was long current in Oxford, and was at times complacently accepted by the reputed son. But it is safer to adopt the less compromising version which makes Shakespeare the boy's godfather. He was a welcome guest at John D'Avenant's house, and another son, Robert, reported the kindly notice which the poet took of him as a child (cf. AUBREY, Lives; HALLIWELL-PHILLIPS, ii. 43; art. D'AVENANT, SIR WILLIAM). Ben Jonson and Drayton—the latter a Warwickshire man—seem to have been Shakespeare's chief literary friends in his latest years.

Actor-friends.

At Stratford Shakespeare in his declining days took a full share of social and civic responsibilities. On 16 Oct. 1608 he stood chief godfather to William, son of Henry Walker, a mercer and alderman. On 11 Sept. 1611, when he had finally settled in New Place, his name appeared in the margin of a folio page of donors (including all the principal inhabitants of Stratford) to a fund that was raised 'towards the charge of prosecuting the bill in Parliament for the better repair of the highways.'

Meanwhile, domestic affairs engaged some of his attention. Of his two surviving children—both daughters—the eldest, Susanna, had married, on 5 June 1607, John Hall (1575-1635) [q. v.], a rising physician of puritan leanings, and in the following February was born the poet's only granddaughter, Elizabeth Hall. On 9 Sept. 1608 the poet's mother was buried in the parish church, and on 4 Feb. 1613 his third brother Richard. On 15 July 1613 Mrs. Hall preferred, with her father's assistance, a charge of slander against one Lane in the ecclesiastical court at Worcester; the defendant, who had apparently charged the lady with illicit relations with one Ralph Smith, did not appear, and was excommunicated.

Domestic affairs.

In the same year (1613), when on a short visit to London, he invested a small sum of money in a new property—his last investment in real estate. He purchased a house, the ground-floor of which was a haberdasher's shop, with a yard attached. It was situated within six hundred feet of the Blackfriars Theatre—on the west side of St. Andrew's Hill, formerly termed Puddle Hill or Puddle Dock Hill, in the near neighbourhood of what is now known as Ireland Yard. The former owner, Henry Walker, a musician, had bought the property for 100*l.* in 1604. Shakespeare in 1613 agreed to pay him 140*l.* The deeds of conveyance bear the date of 10 March in that year. The indenture prepared for the purchaser is in the Halliwell-Phillips collection, which was sold to Mr. Marsden J. Perry of Providence, Rhode Island, U.S.A., in January 1897. That held by the vendor is in the Guildhall Library. Next day, on 11 March, Shakespeare executed another deed (now in the British Museum) which stipulated that 60*l.* of the purchase-money was to remain on mortgage until the following Michaelmas, but the money was unpaid at Shakespeare's death. In all three documents—the two indentures and the mortgage deed—Shakespeare is described as 'of Stratford-on-Avon, in the Countie of Warwick, Gentleman.' There is no reason to suppose that he acquired the house for his own residence. He at once leased the property to John Robinson, already a resident in the neighbourhood.

In the spring of 1614 a preacher at Stratford, doubtless of puritan proclivities, was entertained at New Place after delivering a sermon. Shakespeare's son-in-law Hall was probably responsible for the civility. In July John Combe, a rich inhabitant of Stratford, died and left 5*l.* to Shakespeare. The legend that Shakespeare alienated him by composing some doggerel on his practice of lending money at ten per cent. seems apocryphal, although it is accepted by Rowe. Combe's death involved Shakespeare more conspicuously than before in civic affairs. Combe's heir William no sooner succeeded to his father's lands than he, with a neighbouring owner, Arthur Mannering, steward of Lord-chancellor Ellesmere (who was ex-officio lord of the manor) attempted to enclose the common fields, which belonged to the corporation of Stratford, about his estate at Welcombe. The corporation resolved to offer the scheme a stout resistance. Shakespeare had a twofold interest in the matter by virtue of his owning 106 acres at Welcombe and Old Stratford, and as joint owner—now with Thomas Greene, the town clerk—of the tithes of Old Stratford, Welcombe, and Bishopton. His interest in his freeholds could not have been prejudicially affected, but his interest in the tithes might be depreciated by the proposed enclosure. Shakespeare consequently joined with his fellow-owner Greene in obtaining from Combe's agent Replingham in October 1614 a deed indemnifying both against any injury they might suffer from the enclosure. But having secured himself against loss, Shakespeare threw his influence into Combe's scale. In November 1614 he was on a last visit to London, and Greene, whose official position as town clerk compelled him to support the corporation, visited him there to discuss the position of affairs. On 23 Dec. 1614 the corporation in formal meeting drew up a letter to Shakespeare imploring him to aid them. Greene himself sent to the dramatist 'a note of inconveniences [to the corporation that] would happen by the enclosure.' But although an ambiguous entry of a later date (September 1616) in the few extant pages of Greene's ungrammatical diary has been unjustifiably tortured into an expression of disgust on Shakespeare's part at Combe's conduct, it may be inferred that, in the spirit of his agreement with Combe's agent, he continued to lend Combe his countenance. Happily Combe's efforts failed, and the common lands remained unenclosed (Shakespeare and the Enclosure of Common Fields at Welcombe, a facsimile of Greene's diary, now at Stratford, with a transcript by Mr. E. J. L. Scott, edited by Dr. C. M. Ingleby, 1885).

Attempts to enclose the Stratford common fields.

At the beginning of 1616 Shakespeare's health was failing. He directed Francis Collins, a solicitor of Warwick, to draft his will, but, though it was prepared for signature on 25 Jan., it was for the time laid aside. On 10 Feb. 1616 Shakespeare's younger daughter, Judith, married, at the parish church, Thomas Quiney, son of an old friend of the poet, four years her junior. The ceremony took place before a license was procured, and the irregularity led to the summons of the bride and bridegroom before the ecclesiastical court at Worcester and the imposition of a fine. According to the testimony of John Ward, the vicar, Shakespeare entertained at New Place his two friends, Michael Drayton and Ben Jonson, in the spring of 1616, Death.

and 'had a merry meeting,' but 'itt seems drank too hard, for Shakespeare died of a feavour there contracted.' A popular local legend, which was not recorded till 1762 (Brit. Mag. June 1762), credited Shakespeare with engaging at an earlier date in a prolonged and violent drinking bout at Bidford, a neighbouring village (cf. MALONE, Shakespeare, 1821, ii. 500-2; IRILLAND, Confessions, 1805, p. 34; GRUBB, Legend of the Crab Tree, 1857), but his achievements as a hard drinker may be dismissed as unproven. The cause of his death is undetermined, but probably a recurrence of illness led him in March to sign the will that had been drafted in the previous January. On Tuesday, 23 April, he died at the age of fifty-two. (The date is in the old style, and is equivalent to 3 May in the new; Cervantes, whose death is often described as simultaneous, died at Madrid ten days earlier—on 13 April in the old style, i.e. 23 April 1616 in the new.)

Burial. On Thursday, 25 April (O.S.), the poet was buried inside Stratford church, near the northern wall of the chancel, in which, as one of the lay-rectors, he had a right of interment. Hard by was the charnel-house, where bones dug up from the churchyard were deposited. Over the poet's grave were inscribed the lines:

Good friend, for Jesus' sakes forbear
To dig the dust enclosed here;
Bleste be the man that spares these stones,
And curst be he that moves my bones.

According to one William Hall, who described a visit to Stratford in 1694 (London, 1884, 4to), these verses were penned by Shakespeare to suit 'the capacity of clerks and sextons, for the most part a very ignorant set of people.' Had this curse not threatened them, Hall proceeds, they would not have hesitated in course of time to remove Shakespeare's dust to 'the bone-house'; the grave was made seventeen feet deep, and was never opened, even to receive his wife, although she expressed a desire to be buried with her husband.

Shakespeare's will, the first draft of which was drawn up before 25 Jan. 1616, received many interlineations and erasures. The will. before it was signed in the ensuing March. Francis Collins, the solicitor of Warwick, and Thomas Russell, 'esquier' of Stratford, were the overseers; it was proved by John Hall, the poet's son-in-law and joint-executor with Mrs. Hall, in London on 22 June following. The religious exordium is in conventional phraseology, and gives no clue to Shakespeare's personal religious opinions. What those opinions were, we have neither the means nor the warrant for discussing. But while it is possible to quote from the plays many contemptuous references to the puritans and their doctrines, we may dismiss as idle gossip Davies's irresponsible report that 'he dyed a papist.' The name of Shakespeare's wife was omitted from the original draft of the will, but by an interpolation in the final draft she received his second best bed with its furniture. No other bequest was made her. Her right to a widow's dower—i.e. to a third share for life in freehold estate—was not subject to testamentary disposition, but Shakespeare seems to have barred her dower, at any rate in the case of his Blackfriars purchase. The precision with which the will accounts for and disposes of every known item of his property refutes, too, the conjecture that he had provided for his wife under a previous settlement or jointure. But however plausible the theory that his relations with her, especially in early life, were wanting in sympathy, it is improbable that the slender mention of her in the will was a deliberate mark of his indifference or dislike. Local tradition subsequently credited her with a wish to be buried in his grave; and her epitaph proves that she inspired her daughter with genuine affection. Probably her ignorance of affairs and the infirmities of age (she was past sixty) combined to unfit her in the poet's eyes for the control of property, and he committed her to the care of his elder daughter, who inherited, according to such information as is accessible, some of his own shrewdness, and had a capable adviser in her husband. This elder daughter, Susannah Hall, was, according to the will, to become mistress of New Place, and practically of all the poet's estate. She received (with remainder to her issue in strict entail) New Place, all the land, barns, and gardens at and near Stratford (except the tenement in Chapel Lane), and the house in Blackfriars, London, while she and her husband were appointed executors and residuary legatees, with full rights over nearly all the poet's household furniture and personal belongings. To the granddaughter, or 'niece,' Elizabeth Hall, was bequeathed the poet's plate, with the exception of his broad silver and gilt bowl, which was reserved for his younger daughter, Judith. To his younger daughter he also left, with the tenement in Chapel Lane (in remainder to the elder daughter), 150*l.* in money, of which 100*l.*, her marriage portion, was to be paid within a year, and another 150*l.* to be paid to her if alive three years after the date of the will. (150*l.* is described as a substantial jointure in 'Merry Wives,' act iii. sc. iii. l. 49). To the poet's sister, Joan Hart, whose husband, William Hart, predeceased the testator by only six days, he left, besides a contingent reversionary interest in Judith's pecuniary legacy, his wearing apparel, 20*l.* in money, a life interest in the Henley Street property, with 5*l.* for each of her three sons, William, Thomas, and Michael. To the poor of Stratford he gave 10*l.*, and to Mr. Thomas Combe (apparently a brother of William, of the enclosure controversy) his sword. To each of his Stratford friends, Hamlett Sadler, William Reynoldes, Anthony Nash, and John Nash, and to each of his 'fellows' (i.e. theatrical colleagues), John Heming, Richard Burbage, and Henry Condell, he left xxv*js.* viij*d.*, with which to buy memorial rings. His godson, William Walker, received 'xx' shillings in gold.

Before 1623 an elaborate monument, by a London sculptor, Gerard Johnson, was erected to Shakespeare's memory in the chancel of the parish church (cf. DUGDALE, Diary, 1827, p. 99; see under JANSSEN, BERNARD). It includes a half-length bust, and a pen is in the right hand. The inscription, which was apparently written by a London friend, runs:

Judicio Pylum, genio Socratem, arte Maronem,
Terra tegit, populus marcet, Olympus habet.

Stay passenger, why goest thou by so fast?

Read if thou canst, whom envious death hath plast

Within this monument; Shakespeare with whom Quick nature dide; whose name doth deck ys tombe

Far more than cost; sith all yt he hath writt
Leaves living art but page to serve his witt.

Obiit ano. doi 1616 Ætatis 53 Die 23 Ap.

At the opening of Shakespeare's career Chettle wrote of his 'civil demeanour' and of the reports of 'his uprightness of dealing which argues his honesty.' After the close of his career Jonson wrote of him: 'I loved the man and do honour his memory, on this side idolatry as much as any. He was, indeed, honest and of an open and free nature' ('Timber,' in Works, 1641). No other contemporary left on record any definite impression of Shakespeare's personal character. But the references in his will to his fellow-actors,

Personal
character.

and the spirit in which (as they announce in the first folio) they approached the task of collecting his works after his death, corroborate the description of him as a sympathetic friend. The later traditions brought together by Aubrey depict him as 'very good company, and of a very ready and pleasant smooth wit,' and there is much in other early references to suggest a genial, if not a convivial, temperament, with a turn for good-humoured satire. Pope had just warrant for his surmise that Shakespeare

For gain not glory winged his roving flight,
And grew immortal in his own despite.

With his literary power and sociability there clearly went the shrewd capacity of a man of business. His literary attainments and successes were chiefly valued as serving the prosaic end of providing permanently for himself and his children. His highest ambition was to restore among his fellow-townsmen the family repute which his father's misfortunes had imperilled. Ideals so homely are reckoned rare among poets, but Chaucer and Sir Walter Scott, among writers of exalted genius, vie with Shakespeare in the sobriety of their personal aims and the sanity of their mental attitude towards life's ordinary incidents.

Shakespeare's widow died on 6 Aug. 1623, at the age of sixty-seven, and was buried near her husband inside the chancel two days later. Some affectionately phrased Latin elegiacs—doubtless from Dr. Hall's pen—were inscribed on a brass plate fastened to the stone above her grave. The younger daughter, Judith, resided with her husband, Thomas Quiney, at The Cage, a house which he leased in Bridge Street from 1616 till 1652. There he carried on the trade of a vintner, and took part in municipal affairs, acting as a councillor from 1617 and as chamberlain in 1621–2 and 1622–3, but after 1630 his affairs grew embarrassed, and he left Stratford late in 1652 for London, where he seems to have died a few months later. Of his three sons by Judith, the eldest, Shakespeare (bapt. 23 Nov. 1616), was buried in Stratford churchyard on 8 May 1617; Richard (bapt. 9 Feb. 1617–8) was buried on 23 Jan. 1638–9; and Thomas (bapt. 23 Jan. 1619–20) was buried on 26 Feb. 1638–9. Judith survived her husband, sons, and sister, dying at Stratford on 9 Feb. 1661–1662, in her seventy-seventh year.

The elder daughter, Susannah Hall, resided at New Place till her death. Her sister Judith alienated to her the Chapel Place tenement before 1633, but that, with the interest in the Stratford tithes, she soon disposed of. Her husband John Hall died on 25 Nov. 1635. In 1642 James Cooke, a surgeon in attendance on some royalist troops stationed at Stratford, visited Mrs. Hall and examined manuscripts in her possession, but they were apparently of her husband's, not of her father's, composition (cf. HALL, Select Observations, ed. Cooke, 1857). From 11 to 13 July 1643 Queen Henrietta Maria, while journeying from Newark, was billeted on Mrs. Hall at New Place for three days. She was buried beside her husband in Stratford churchyard on 11 July 1649, and a rhyming inscription, describing her as 'witty above her sex,' was engraved on her tombstone.

Mrs. Hall's only child, Elizabeth, was the last surviving descendant of the poet. In April 1626 she married her first husband, Thomas Nash of Stratford (b. 1593), who studied at Lincoln's Inn, was a man of property, and, dying childless at New Place on 4 April 1647, was buried in Stratford church next day. Mrs. Nash married at Billesley, a village four miles from Stratford, on 5 June 1649, a widower, John Bernard or Barnard of Abington, Northamptonshire, who was knighted by Charles II in 1661. About the same date she seems to have abandoned New Place for her husband's residence at Abington. Dying without issue, she was buried there on 17 Feb. 1669–70. Her husband survived her four years, and was buried beside her (BAKER, Northamptonshire, i. 10; New Shakesp. Soc. Trans. 1880–5, pt. ii. pp. 137–157). Lady Barnard inherited under the poet's will (on her mother's death in 1649) the land near Stratford, New Place, the house at Blackfriars, and (on the death of the poet's sister Joan in 1646) the houses in Henley Street, while her father left her in 1635 a house at Acton with a meadow. She sold the Blackfriars house, and apparently the Stratford land, before 1607. By her will, dated January 1669–70, and proved in the following March, she left small bequests to the daughters of Thomas Hathaway, of the family of her grandmother, the poet's wife. The house in Henley Street passed to her cousin, Thomas Hart, the grandson of the poet's sister Joan, and they remained in the possession of Thomas's direct descendants till 1806 (the male line expired on the death of John Hart in 1800). By her will Lady Barnard ordered New Place to be sold, and it was purchased on 18 May 1675 by Sir Edward Walker, through whose daughter Barbara, wife of Sir John Clopton, it reverted to the Clopton family. Sir John rebuilt it in 1702. On the death of his son Hugh in 1752 it was bought by the Rev. Francis Gastrell (d. 1768), who demolished

The last descendant.

the new building in 1759 (HALLIWELL-PHILLIPS, Hist. of New Place, 1864, fol.)

Of Shakespeare's three brothers, only one, Gilbert, seems to have survived him. Edmund, the youngest brother, 'a player,' was buried at St. Saviour's Church, Southwark, 'with a forenoon knell of the great bell,' on 31 Dec. 1607; he was in his twenty-eighth year. Richard, John Shakespeare's third son, died at Stratford, in February 1613, aged 39. 'Gilbert Shakespeare adolescens,' who was buried at Stratford on 3 Feb. 1611-12, was doubtless son of the poet's next brother, Gilbert; the latter, having nearly completed his forty-sixth year, could scarcely be described as 'adolescens'; his death is not recorded, but according to Oldye he survived to a patriarchal age.

Much controversy has arisen over the spelling of the poet's surname. It has been proved capable of four thousand variations (WISE, Autograph of William Shakespeare . . . together with 4,000 ways of spelling the name, Philadelphia, 1869).

The name of the poet's father is entered sixty-six times in the council books of Stratford, and is spelt in sixteen ways. The commonest form is 'Shaxpeare.' Five autographs of the poet of undisputed authenticity are extant: his signature to the indenture relating to the purchase of the property in Blackfriars, dated 10 March 1612-13 (since 1841 in the Guildhall Library); his signature to the mortgage deed relating to the same purchase, dated 11 March 1612-13 (since 1858 in the British Museum); and the three signatures on the three sheets of his will, dated 25 March 1615-16 (now at Somerset House).

In all the signatures some of the letters are represented by recognised signs of abbreviation. The signature to the first document is 'William Shakspeare,' though in all other portions of the deeds the name is spelt 'Shakespeare.' The signature to the second document has been interpreted both as Shakspeare and Shakespeare. The ink of the first signature in the will has now faded almost beyond decipherment, but that it was 'Shakspeare' may be inferred from the facsimile made by Steevens in 1776. The second and third signatures to the will, which are difficult to decipher, have been read both as Shakespeare and Shakespeare; but a close examination suggests that, whatever the second signature may be, the third is 'Shakespeare.' Shakespeare is the spelling of the alleged autograph in the British Museum copy of Florio's 'Montaigne,' but the genuineness of that signature is disputable (see art. FLORIO, JOHN; and MADDEN's Observations on an Autograph of Shakspeare, 1838). Shakespeare was the form adopted in the full signature appended to the dedicatory epistles of the 'Venus and Adonis' of 1593 and the 'Lucrèce' of 1594, volumes which were produced under the poet's supervision. It is the spelling adopted on the title-pages of the majority of contemporary editions of his works, whether or not produced under his supervision. It is adopted in almost all the published references to the poet during the seventeenth century. It appears in the grant of arms in 1596, in the licence to the players of 1603, and in the text of all the legal documents relating to the poet's property. The poet, like most of his contemporaries, acknowledged no finality on the subject. According to the best authority, he spelt his surname in two ways when signing his will. There is consequently no good ground for abandoning the form which is sanctioned by legal and literary custom (cf. HALLIWELL-PHILLIPS, New Lampe or Old, 1880; MALONE, Inquiry, 1796).

PORTRAITS AND MEMORIALS.

Aubrey reported that Shakespeare was 'a handsome, well-shap'd man.' Only two extant portraits can be regarded as fully authenticated: the bust in Stratford church and the frontispiece to the folio of 1623. There is considerable discrepancy between the two; their main point of resemblance is the baldness on the top of the head. The bust, attributed to Gerard Johnson, is a rudely carved specimen of mortuary sculpture; the round face and eyes present a heavy, unintellectual expression, and it has no apparent claim to be regarded as an accurate likeness. It was originally coloured, but in 1793 Malone caused it to be whitewashed. In 1861 the whitewash was removed, and the colours, as far as traceable, restored. The eyes are hazel. There have been numberless reproductions, both engraved and photographic. It was first engraved—very imperfectly—for Rowe's edition in 1709; then by Vertue for Pope's edition of 1725; and by Gravelot for Hanmer's edition in 1744. A good engraving by William Ward appeared in 1816. A phototype and a chromo-phototype, issued by the New Shakespeare Society, are the best reproductions for the purposes of study. The painting known as the 'Stratford' portrait, and presented in 1867 by W. O. Hunt, town clerk of Stratford, to the Birthplace Museum, was probably painted from the bust in the seventeenth century; the picture belonged at one time to the Clopton family.

The Stratford bust.

The Stratford portrait.

Autograph signatures.

The engraved portrait—nearly a half-length—which was prefixed to the folio of 1623, was by Martin Droeshout Droeshout's engraving.

[q. v.] On the opposite page lines by Ben Jonson congratulate 'the graver' on having satisfactorily 'hit' the poet's 'face.' Jonson's testimony must be accepted, but the expression of countenance is very crudely rendered. The face is long and the forehead high; the top of the head is bald, but the hair falls in abundance over the ears. There is a scanty moustache and a thin tuft under the lower lip. A stiff and wide collar, projecting horizontally, conceals the neck. The coat is closely buttoned and elaborately bordered, especially at the shoulders. In the unique proof copy which belonged to Halliwell-Phillipps (now with his collection in America), the tone is clearer than in the ordinary copies, and the shadows are less darkened by cross-hatching and coarse dotting. A copy of the Droeshout engraving, by William Marshall, was prefixed to Shakespeare's 'Poems' in 1640, and Faithorne made another copy for separate issue in 1655. A portrait painted on a panel, with 'Will Shakespeare 1609' in the upper left-hand corner (since 1892 in the Shakespeare Memorial Gallery at Stratford), bears close resemblance to the engraving, and was doubtless executed in the seventeenth century, but the contention that it was the original painting whence the engraving was made has not been established; it was more probably painted from the engraving. The same remark applies to a somewhat similar picture, the 'Ely House' portrait (now the property of the Birthplace Trustees at Stratford), which formerly belonged to Thomas Turton [q. v.], bishop of Ely; it is inscribed 'æ. 39 x. 1603' (Harper's Mag., May 1897).

Of the numerous extant paintings which have been described as portraits of Shakespeare, only the three at Stratford already mentioned resemble either the bust or the folio engraving. Of those presenting other features of interest, the most famous is the Chandos portrait. It is now in the National Portrait Gallery, and may possibly have been painted by Janssens or Van Somer. Its pedigree suggests that it was designed to represent the poet, but some conspicuous divergences from the two authenticated likenesses show that it was painted from fanciful descriptions of him after his death. The face is bearded, and rings adorn the ears. Oldys reported that it was from the brush of Burbage and had belonged to Joseph Taylor, an actor contemporary with Shakespeare. Later owners are said to have been D'Avenant, Betterton, and Mrs. Barry the actress. In 1693 Sir Godfrey Kneller made a copy as a gift for Dryden. At length it reached the hands of James Brydget, third duke of Chandos, through his father-in-law, John Nichols, and it subsequently passed, through Chandos's daughter, to her husband, the Duke of Buckingham, at the sale of whose heir's effects at Stowe in 1848 it was purchased by the Earl of Ellesmere. The latter presented it to the nation. Edward Capell presented a copy by R. Barrat to Trinity College, Cambridge, and other copies are assigned to Sir Joshua Reynolds and Ozias Humphrey (1783). It was engraved for Pope's edition (1725), and often later, one of the best engravings being by Vanderghucht. The Baroness Burdett-Coutts purchased in 1874 a portrait of similar type, which had at one time belonged to John, lord Lumley (1534 P-1609) [q. v.]; it was chromolithographed by Vincent Brooks. At Hampton Court is a wholly unauthentic portrait of the same type, which was at one time at Penshurst; it bears the legend 'Ætatis suæ 34' (Law, Cat. of Hampton Court, p. 234).

The Chandos portrait.

The so-called 'Jansen' or Janssens portrait, which belongs to the Duke of Somerset, was first doubtfully identified about 1770, when in the possession of Charles Jennens [q. v.] Janssens did not come to England before Shakespeare's death. A fine mezzotint by R. Earlom was issued in 1811.

The 'Felton' portrait, a small head on a panel (now belonging to the Baroness Burdett-Coutts) was purchased by S. Felton of Drayton, Shropshire, in 1794 of J. Wilson, the owner of the Shakespeare Museum in Pall Mall; it bears a late inscription, 'Gul. Shakespear 1597, R. B.' [i.e. Richard Burbage]. It was engraved by Josiah Boydell for George Steevens in 1797, and by J. Neagle for Isaac Reed's edition in 1803.

Three portraits are assigned to Zuccherò, who left England in 1580, and cannot have had any relations with Shakespeare. One is in the Art Museum, Boston, U.S.A.; another, formerly the property of Richard Cosway, R.A., and afterwards of Mr. J. A. Langford of Birmingham, was engraved in mezzotint by H. Green; a third, purchased in 1862, belonged to the Baroness Burdett-Coutts.

The 'Soest' or 'Zoust' portrait—in the possession of Sir John Lister-Kaye of Denby Grange, Wakefield—was in the collection of T. Wright, painter, of Covent Garden, in 1725, when I. Simon engraved it. Soest was born twenty-one years after Shake-Shakespeare's death, and the portrait is only on fanciful grounds identified with the poet. A chalk drawing by Joseph Michael Wright [q. v.], obviously inspired by the Soest portrait, is the property of Sir Arthur Hodgson of Clopton House, and is on loan at the Memorial Gallery, Stratford.

A portrait inscribed 'ætatis suæ 47, 1611,' belonging to Clement Kingston of Ashbourne, Derbyshire, was engraved in mezzotint by G. F. Storm in 1846.

A miniature by Hilliard, at one time in the possession of William Somerville [q. v.] the poet, and now the property of Sir Stafford Northcote, bart., was engraved by Agar for vol. ii. of the 'Variorum Shakespeare' of 1821, and in Wivell's 'Inquiry,' 1827. Another miniature (called the 'Auriol' portrait), of doubtful authenticity, formerly belonged to Mr. Lumsden Propert, and a third is at Warwick Castle.

A bust, said to be of Shakespeare, was discovered in 1845 bricked up in a wall in

The Garrick Club bust.

Spode & Copeland's china warehouse in Lincoln's Inn Fields.

The warehouse had been erected on the site of the Duke's Theatre, which was built by D'Avenant in 1660. The bust, which was believed to have adorned the proscenium of the Duke's Theatre, was acquired by William Clift [q. v.], from whom it passed to his son-in-law, Richard (afterwards Sir Richard) Owen. The latter sold it to the Duke of Devonshire, who presented it in 1851 to the Garrick Club, after having two copies made.

The Kesselstadt death-mask was discovered by Dr. Ludwig Becker in a rag-shop at Mayence in 1849. The features Alleged death-mask.

resemble those of an alleged portrait of Shakespeare (dated 1637) which Dr. Becker purchased in 1847. This picture had long been in the possession of the family of Count Francis von Kesselstadt of Mayence, who died in 1843. Dr. Becker brought the mask and the picture to England in 1849, and Richard Owen supported the theory that the mask was taken from Shakespeare's face after death, and was the foundation of the bust in Stratford church. The mask is now the property of Dr. Ernest Becker (the discoverer's brother), and is at the ducal palace, Darmstadt. The features are singularly attractive; but the chain of evidence which would identify them with Shakespeare is incomplete.

In 1886 Mr. Walter Rogers Furness issued, at Philadelphia, a volume of composite portraits, combining the Droeshout engraving and the Stratford bust with the Chandos, Jansen, Felton, and Stratford portraits

(JAMES BOADEN, Inquiry into various Pictures and Prints of Shakespeare, 1824; ABRAHAM WIVELL, Inquiry into Shakespeare's Portraits, 1827, with engravings by B. and W. Holl; GEORGE SCHARF, Principal Portraits of Shakespeare, 1804; J. HAIN FRISWELL, Life-portraits of Shakespeare, 1864; WILLIAM PAGE, Study of Shakespeare's Portraits, 1870; INGEBY, Man and Book, 1877, pp. 84 seq.; J. PARKER NORRIS, Portraits of Shakespeare, Philadelphia, 1885, with numerous plates; M. H. SPIELMANN, in Stratford Town Shakespeare, 1906-7, vol. x.)

A monument, the expenses of which were defrayed by public subscription, was set up in the Poets' Corner in Westminster Abbey in 1741. Pope and the Earl of Burlington were among the promoters. The design was by William Kent [q. v.], and the statue of Shakespeare was executed by Peter Scheemakers [q. v.] (cf. Gent. Mag. 1741, p. 105).

Another statue was executed by Roubiliac for Garrick, who bequeathed it to the British Museum in 1779. A third statue is in Leicester Square, London; a fourth (by Mr. J. A. Q. Ward) was placed in 1882 in the Central Park, New York; a fifth, by M. Paul Fournier, in the Avenue de Messine, Paris, in 1883, at the expense of an English resident, Mr. W. Knighton; a sixth, by Lord Ronald Gower, at Stratford in 1883, and a seventh at Weimar in 1904.

At Stratford, the Birthplace, which was acquired by the public in 1846 and converted into a museum, is, with Anne Hathaway's cottage (acquired by the Birthplace trustees in 1892), a place of pilgrimage for tourists from all parts of the globe. The 44,213 persons who visited it in 1907 represented over forty nationalities. The site of the demolished New Place, with the gardens, was also purchased by public subscription in 1861. Of a new memorial building on the riverbank at Stratford, consisting of a theatre, picture-gallery, and library, the foundation-stone was laid on 23 April 1877. The theatre was opened exactly two years later, when 'Much Ado about Nothing' was performed, with Helen Faucit (Lady Martin) as Beatrice and Barry Sullivan as Benedick. Performances of Shakespeare's plays have since been given annually during April. The library and picture-gallery were opened in 1881 (A History of the Shakespeare Memorial, Stratford-on-Avon, 1882; Illustrated Cat. of Pictures in the Shakespeare Memorial, 1896). A memorial Shakespeare library was opened at Birmingham on 23 April 1868 to commemorate the tercentenary of 1664, and, although destroyed by fire in 1879, was restored in 1882, and now possesses 9,640 volumes relating to Shakespeare.

BIBLIOGRAPHY.

At the time of Shakespeare's death in 1616 there had been printed seven editions of his 'Venus and Adonis' (1593, 1594 in 4to, 1596, 1599, 1600, and two in 1602 in 8vo); five editions of his 'Lucrece' (1594 in 4to, 1598, 1600, 1607, 1616 in 8vo); one edition of the 'Sonnets' (1609, facsimiled in 1862), and three editions of the piratical 'Passionate Pilgrim,' containing a few poems by him (1599, 1600 unknown, 1612). (The first editions of these four volumes were reproduced in facsimile at Oxford in 1905.) A sixth edition of 'Lucrece' (1624) and six later editions of 'Venus' (1617, 1620, 1627, two in 1630, and 1636) preceded the issue of the first collected edition of the 'Poems' in 1640 (London, by T. Cotes for I. Benson). Marshall's copy of the Droeshout engraving of 1623 formed the frontispiece. There are prefatory poems by Leonard Digges and John Warren, as well as an address 'to the reader' signed by the initials of the publisher, together with 'an addition of some excellent poems to those preceded by other Gentlemen,' which are mainly from Thomas Heywood's 'General History of Women.' A reprint appeared 1885.

Of Shakespeare's plays there were in print in 1616 only sixteen (all in quarto), or eighteen if we include the 'Contention,' the first draft of '2 Henry VI' (1594 and 1600), and 'The True Tragedy,' the first draft of '3 Henry VI' (1595 and 1600). Of the sixteen fully authenticated quartos, two plays reached five editions before 1616, viz. 'Richard III' (1507, 1598, 1602, 1605, 1612) and '1 Henry IV' (1598, 1599, 1604, 1608, 1615). Three reached four editions, viz. 'Richard II' (1597, 1598, 1608 supplying the deposition scene for the first time, 1615), 'Hamlet' (1603 imperfect, 1604, 1605, 1611), and 'Romeo and Juliet' (1597 imperfect, 1599, two in 1609). Three reached three editions, viz. 'Titus' (1594, 1600, 1611), 'Henry V' (1600 imperfect, 1602, 1608), 'Pericles' (two in 1609, 1611). Four reached two editions, viz. 'Midsummer Night's Dream' (both in 1600), 'Merchant of Venice' (both in 1600), 'Lear' (both in 1608), and 'Troilus and Cressida' (both in 1609). Four achieved only one edition, viz. 'Love's Labour's Lost' (1598), '2 Henry IV' (1600), 'Much Ado' (1600), 'Merry Wives' (1602 imperfect).

A second edition of 'Merry Wives' (again imperfect) and a fourth of 'Pericles' are both dated 1619. 'Othello' was first printed in 1622 (4to), and in the same year sixth editions of both 'Richard III' and '1 Henry IV' appeared. Lithographed facsimiles of most of these volumes, with some of the quarto editions of the poems (forty-eight volumes in all), were prepared by Mr. E. W. Ashbee, and issued to subscribers by Halliwell-Phillipps between 1862 and 1871. A cheaper set of quarto facsimiles, undertaken by Mr. W. Griggs, and issued under the supervision of Dr. F. J. Furnivall, appeared in forty-three volumes between 1880 and 1889. The largest collection of the original quartos—each of which only survives in four, five, or six copies—are in the libraries of the Duke of Devonshire, the British Museum, the Bodleian, and Trinity College, Cambridge. Perfect copies range in price, according to their rarity, from 200*l.* to 2,000*l.* In 1864, at the sale of George Daniel's library, quarto copies of 'Love's Labour's Lost' and of 'Merry Wives' (first edition) each fetched 34*l.* 10*s.* On 28 April 1904 a copy of the quarto of 'The Second Part of Henry IV' (printed in 1600) was sold at Sotheby's for 1,085*l.* All the quartos were issued in Shakespeare's day at sixpence each.

On 8 Nov. 1623 Edward Blount and Isaac (son of William) Jaggard obtained license to publish sixteen hitherto unprinted plays, viz. 'The Tempest,' 'The Two Gentlemen,' 'Measure for Measure,' 'Comedy of Errors,' 'As you like it,' 'All's Well,' 'Twelfth Night,' 'Winter's Tale,' '3 Henry VI,' 'Henry VIII,' 'Coriolanus,' 'Timon,' 'Julius Caesar,' 'Macbeth,' 'Antony and Cleopatra,' and 'Cymbeline.' In the same year Blount and Jaggard produced a folio volume of nearly a thousand pages containing all the plays mentioned, with the exception of 'Pericles,' and with the addition of 'King John,' '1 and 2 Henry VI,' and the 'Taming of the Shrew' (none of the latter pieces received a license). Thirty-six pieces in all were thus brought together. The volume was sold at a pound a copy, and was described in the colophon as printed at the charges of W. Jaggard, I. Smithweeke, and W. Aspley, as well as of Blount. The latter doubtless saw it through the press (cf. Bibliographica, i. 489 seq.). The plays are arranged under three headings—'Comedies,' 'Histories,' and 'Tragedies'—and each division is separately pagged. 'Troilus and Cressida,' which is absent from the list of contents, was inserted hastily after the volume was printed off; it is placed at the end of the 'Histories,' and is unpagged. Doubtless the large work was long in printing. A unique copy in the Lenox Library, New York, bears the date 1622, and includes two cancelled leaves of sheet R ('As you like it').

On the title-page is engraved the Droeshout portrait. Commendatory verses are supplied by Ben Jonson, Hugh Holland, Leonard Digges [q. v.], and I. M., perhaps Jasper Maine [q. v.]. The dedication to the brothers William Herbert, earl of Pembroke, and Philip Herbert, earl of Montgomery, as well as an address 'to the great variety of readers,' is signed by Shakespeare's friends and fellow-actors, Heming and Condell, who accept a large responsibility for the enterprise. They disclaim 'ambition either of self-profit or fame,' being solely moved by anxiety to 'keepe the memory of so worthy a friend and fellow alive as was our Shakespeare.' 'It had bene a thing we confesse worthe to haue bene wished,' they inform the reader, 'that the author himselfe had liued to haue set forth and ouerseen his owne writings. . . . As where (before) we were abus'd with diuerse stolne and surreptitious copies, maimed and deformed by the frauds and stealthes of iniurious impostors that expos'd them; even those are now offer'd to your view cur'd and perfect of their limbes, and all the rest absolute in their numbers as he conceived them.' The title-page states, too, that all the plays were printed 'according to the true originall copies.' But the first-folio text is not in every case superior to that of the sixteen pre-existent quartos, from which it differs invariably, although in varying degrees. The quarto texts of 'Love's Labour's Lost,' 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' and 'Richard II' are, for example, of higher value than the folio texts. On the other hand, the folio first repairs the glaring defects of the quarto versions of 'The Merry Wives of Windsor' and of 'Henry V.'

About fourteen perfect copies and 170 imperfect copies of the first folio seem now known. One of the finest copies was purchased by the Baroness Burdett-Coutts for 716*l.* 2*s.* at the sale of George Daniel's library in 1864. Frederick Locker-Lampson's copy fetched 3,600*l.* at Sotheby's 23 March 1907.

A reprint unwarrantably purporting to be exact was published in 1807-8. A good reprint was issued in 3 parts by Lionel Booth in 1861, 1863, 1864. A photo-zincographic reproduction by Sir Henry James, under the direction of Howard Staunton, was issued in sixteen folio parts between Feb. 1864 and Oct. 1865. A reduced photographic facsimile appeared in 1876, with a preface by Halliwell-Phillipps. A collotype facsimile was issued by the Oxford University Press in 1902, with introduction and 'Census of Extant Copies' by the present writer. A pamphlet of 'Additions to the Census' followed in 1906.

The second folio edition was printed in 1632 by Thomas Cotes for Robert Allot and William Aspley, each of whose names figures as publisher on different copies.

The Second Folio. To Allot Blount had transferred.

on 16 Nov. 1630, his rights in the sixteen plays which were first licensed for publication in 1623 (ARBER, iii. 242-3). The second folio is identical with the first. Charles I's copy is at Windsor, and Charles II's at the British Museum. The 'Perkins folio,' now in the Duke of Devonshire's possession, in which Collier introduced forged emendations, was a copy of that of 1632 [see for the controversy, COLLIER, JOHN PAYNE]. The third folio was first published in issued it next year with the addition of seven plays, six of which have no claim to admission among Shakespeare's works. 'Unto this Impression,' runs the title-page of 1664, 'is added seven Playes never before printed in folio, viz.: Pericles, Prince of Tyre. The London Prodigall. The History of Thomas Lord Cromwell. Sir John Oldcastle, Lord Cobham. The Puritan Widow. A Yorkshire Tragedy. The Tragedy of Locrine.' The six spurious pieces were attributed by unprincipled publishers to Shakespeare in his lifetime. The fourth folio, printed in 1685 'for E. Herringman, E. Brewster, R. Chiswell, and R. Bentley,' reprints the folio of 1664 with the spurious appendix.

The Third Folio. 1663 by Peter Chetwynde, who re-

Since 1685 some two hundred independent editions of the collected works have been published in Great Britain and Ireland, and many thousand editions of separate plays. The chief eighteenth-century editors of the collected works were: 1. Nicholas Rowe [q. v.], the earliest critical editor (1709-10, 7 vols.; 2nd edit. 1714). 2. Alexander Pope (1725, 8 vols.; imperfectly collated and corrected. Reprints are dated 1728, with contributions by George Sewall [q. v.], 1731, 1735, 1766; by Foulis of Glasgow, 1768; by Baskerville of Birmingham). 3. Lewis Theobald [q. v.], who made some brilliant emendations (1733, 7 vols.; eight reprints to 1777). 4. Sir Thomas Hanmer (1744, 6 vols. with glossary and various readings, Oxford, 4to; 2nd edit. 1770-1). 5. Bishop Warburton, who re-edited Pope's version in 1747 in 8 vols. and was severely criticised among others by Thomas Edwards (1699-1767) [q. v.]. 6. Dr. Johnson (1765, 8 vols., with his well-known preface and notes; 2nd edit. 1768). 7. Edward Capell [q. v.] (1768, 10 vols., with 'Notes, various readings, and the School of Shakespeare,' in 3 vols. 1783). 8. 'Edmund Malone [q. v.] (1790, 10 vols.) 9. Meanwhile, George Steevens, who reprinted twenty of the quartos in 1766, joined with Johnson in producing the first attempt at a variorum edition in 1773 (10 vols. 8vo). Contributions by Dr. Farmer and Malone were incorporated. This long remained the standard edition. A second issue is dated 1778 (10 vols.); a third, revised by Isaac Reed [q. v.], in 1785; and a fourth, somewhat recklessly revised by Steevens himself, in 15 vols. in 1793. A fifth edition, undertaken by Reed in 1808, in 21 vols., is known among booksellers as the 'First Variorum' edition. A sixth edition (1813, 21 vols.) embodied prefatory essays and notes by Edmund Malone, and is known as 'the Second Variorum.' The seventh edition, on which Malone was long engaged, was prepared for the press by James Boswell the younger [q. v.], and appeared in 1821. It is known as 'the Third Variorum,' or 'Boswell's Malone,' and is the best of its kind. A new 'Variorum' edition, on a large scale, was undertaken by Mr. H. Howard Furness of Philadelphia, and fifteen volumes have appeared since 1871 (including 'Macbeth,' 'Hamlet,' 2 vols., 'King Lear,' 'Othello,' 'Merchant of Venice,' 'As you like it,' 'Tempest,' 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' and 'Antony and Cleopatra').

Among nineteenth-century editors of repute are William Harness (1825, 8 vols.); Samuel Weller Singer (1826, 10 vols., printed in the Chiswick Press for William Pickering, illustrated by Stothard and others, and in 1856 with essays by William Watkins Lloyd); Thomas Campbell, 1838; Charles Knight (1791-1873) [q. v.], with interesting if discursive notes ('Pictorial edition,' 1838-43, often reissued under different designations); Bryan Waller Procter, i.e. Barry Cornwall (1839-43, 3 vols.); John Payne Collier (1841-4, 8 vols.); Samuel Phelps (1851-4); J. O. Halliwell (1863-61, 15 vols. folio); Nikolaus Delius (Elberfeld, 1854-61, 7 vols.; 5th edit. 1882, 2 vols.); Alexander Dyce (1857, 9 vols., a useful edition, with full glossary); Richard Grant White (Boston 1857-65, 12 vols.); Howard Staunton (1858-60, 3 vols.); W. G. Clark, J. Glover, and Dr. Aldis Wright ('Cambridge edition,' 1863-6, 9 vols., noting textual variations; new edit. 1887, and in 40 vols. 1893); Rev. H. N. Hudson (1851-6, 11 vols., reissued as Harvard edition, Boston, 1881, 20 vols.) Among more recent complete annotated editions are 'The Henry Irving Shakespeare,' ed. F. A. Marshall and others—especially useful for notes on stage history (8 vols. 1888-90)—'The Temple Shakespeare,' concisely edited by Israel Gollancz (38 vols. 12mo, 1894-6), and the Eversley Shakespeare, ed. Prof. Harford, 10 vols. 1899.

Of one-volume editions the best are the Globe, edited by W. G. Clark and Dr. Aldis Wright (1864, and constantly reprinted); the Leopold (1876, from the text of Delius, with preface by Dr. Furnivall); and the Oxford (1894), ed. W. J. Craig (1843-1906).

SHAKESPEARE'S REPUTATION.

The highest estimate was formed of Shakespeare's work by his contemporaries, by critics as well as playgoers. Ben Jonson's Anticipating the final verdict, the editors of the first folio wrote: 'These plays have had their trial already and stood out all appeals.' Ben Jonson, as a champion of classical canons, noted that Shakespeare 'wanted art,' but he allowed him, in verses prefixed to the earliest folio, the first place among all dramatists, including those of Greece and Rome, and claimed that all Europe owed him homage. In 1630 Milton penned in like strains an epitaph on 'the great heir of fame' (cf. L'Allegro); and Milton was followed within ten years by critics of tastes so varied as Thomas Heywood, Sir John Suckling, the 'ever-memorable' John Hales of Eton, and Sir William D'Avenant. Leonard Digges (in this first edition of the 'Poems,' 1640) asserted that every revival of his plays drew crowds to pit, boxes, and galleries alike. At a little later date Shakespeare's plays were the 'closest companions' of Charles I's 'solitudes' (Milton, Iconoclastes, 1690, pp. 9-10).

After the Restoration public taste in English veered towards the French and classical dramatic models (cf. Evelyn, Diary, i. 342). Shakespeare's work was subjected to some unfavourable criticism as the product of nature to the exclusion of art, but the eclipse proved more partial and temporary than is commonly admitted. The pedantic censure of Thomas Rymer [q. v.] on the score of Shakespeare's indifference to the classical laws attracted attention, but awoke in England no substantial echo. In Pepys's eyes 'The Tempest' had 'no great wit,' and 'Midsummer Night's Dream' was 'the most insipid and ridiculous play,' yet this exacting critic witnessed thirty-six performances of twelve of Shakespeare's plays between 11 Oct. 1660 and 6 Feb. 1668-9, seeing 'Hamlet' four times, and 'Macbeth,' which he admitted to be 'a most excellent play for variety,' nine times.

Dryden's view. Dryden, the literary dictator of the day, repeatedly complained of Shakespeare's inequalities—he is the very Janus of poets' (Conquest of Granada, 1672).

But in almost the same breath Dryden declared that Shakespeare was held in as much veneration as Æschylus among the Athenians, and that 'he was the man who of all modern and perhaps ancient poets had the largest and most comprehensive soul. . . . When he describes anything, you more than see it—you feel it too' (Essay on Dramatic Poesie, 1668). Writers of such opposite temperaments as Margaret Cavendish, duchess of Newcastle (1664), and Sir Charles Sedley (1693) vigorously argued for Shakespeare's supremacy, and the many adaptations of his plays that were contrived to meet Restoration sentiment failed to supersede their originals. Dryden and D'Avenant converted 'The Tempest' into an opera (1670); D'Avenant singlehandedly adapted 'The Two Noble Kinsmen' (1668) and 'Macbeth' (1674); Dryden dealt similarly with 'Troilus' (1679); Thomas Duffett with 'The Tempest' (1675); Shadwell with 'Timon' (1678); Nahum Tate with 'Richard II' (1681), 'Lear' (1681), and 'Coriolanus' (1682); John Crowne with 'Henry VI' (1691); D'Urfey with 'Cymbeline' (1682); Ravenscroft with 'Titus' (1687); Otway with 'Romeo and Juliet' (1692), and John Sheffield, duke of Buckingham, with 'Julius Cæsar' (1692). But during the same period the chief actor of the day, Thomas Betterton, won his epurs as the interpreter of Shakespeare's chief tragic parts, mainly in unrevised versions. 'Hamlet' was accounted that actor's masterpiece (cf. Shakespeare's Century of Praise, 1591-1693, New Shakspeare Soc., ed. Ingleby and Toulmin Smith, 1879; and Fresh Allusions, ed. Furnivall, 1886).

Restoration adaptations.

From the accession of Queen Anne to the present day the tide of Shakespeare's reputation, both on the stage and among critics, has flowed onward almost uninterruptedly. The censorious critic, John Dennis, in his 'Letters' on Shakespeare's 'genius,' gave his work in 1711 whole-hearted commendation, and two of the greatest men of letters of the eighteenth century, Pope and Johnson, although they did not withhold all censure, paid him the homage of becoming his editor. Through the middle and late years of the century many critics, of whom Theobald and Capell were the most acute, concentrated their energies on textual emendation of difficult and corrupt passages, and they founded a school of textual criticism, which has never ceased its activity (cf. W. SIDNEY WALKER, Critical Examination of the Text of Shakespeare, 1859). At the end of the eighteenth century Edmund Malone [q.v.] devoted himself with unprecedented zeal to the biography of the poet and the contemporary history of the stage, and he secured later disciples in Francis Douce, Joseph Hunter, J. P. Collier, and J. O. Halliwell-Phillipps. Meanwhile a third school arose to expound exclusively the æsthetic excellence of the plays. Coleridge in his 'Notes and Lectures' (which was written partly under German influences), and Hazlitt in his 'Characters of Shakespeare's Plays' (1817), are the chief representatives of the æsthetic school, and, although Professor Dowden, in his 'Shakespeare, his Mind and Art' (1874), and Mr. Swinburne in his 'Study of Shakespeare' (1880), are worthy successors, Coleridge and Hazlitt remain as æsthetic critics unsurpassed. In the effort to supply a fuller interpretation of Shakespeare's works—textual, historical, and æsthetic—two publishing societies have done much valuable work. 'The Shakespeare Society' was founded in 1841 by J. P. Collier, J. O. Halliwell, and their friends, and published some forty-eight volumes before its dissolution in 1853. The New Shakspeare Society, which was founded by Dr. Furnivall in 1874, issued during the ensuing twenty years twenty-seven publications, illustrative mainly of the text and of contemporary life and literature.

VOL. XVII.

In 1769 Shakespeare's 'jubilee' was celebrated for three days (6-8 Sept.) at Stratford, under the direction of Garrick, Dr. Arne, and Boswell. The festivities were repeated on a small scale in April 1827 and April 1830; while 'the Shakespeare tercentenary festival,' which was held at Stratford from 23 April to 4 May 1864, claimed to be a national celebration (R. E. HUNTER, Shakespeare and the Tercentenary Celebration, 1864).

On the English stage the name of every eminent actor since Betterton has been chiefly identified with Shakespearean parts. Robert Wilks and Charles Macklin were in the middle of the eighteenth century eclipsed by David Garrick [q.v.] The latter's enthusiasm for the poet and his histrionic genius did much to strengthen Shakespeare's hold on public taste, but Garrick did not scrupulously adhere to the authorised text. To Garrick, who was ably seconded by Mrs. Cibber and Mrs. Pritchard, soon succeeded John Philip Kemble and his sister, Mrs. Siddons; and during the last century the torch has been kept alive by Edmund Kean, by Macready, by Samuel Phelps, by Helen Faucit (afterwards Lady Martin), by C. A. Calvert, by Miss Ellen Terry, and Sir Henry Irving.

Music and art in England also owe much to Shakespeare's influence. From Thomas Morley [q. v.], Purcell, Matthew Locke, and Arne to William Linley, Sir Henry Bishop, and Sir Arthur Sullivan, every distinguished musician has sought to improve on his predecessor's setting of one or more of Shakespeare's songs, or has composed concerted music in illustration of some of his dramatic themes (cf. ALFRED ROFFE, Shakspeare Music, 1878; Songs in Shakspeare . . . set to Music, 1884, New Shakspeare Soc.) In art, John Boydell [q. v.] organised between 1790 and 1800 a scheme for illustrating Shakespeare's work by the greatest living English artists, and some fine pictures were the result. Few great artists of later date, from Sir Daniel Maclise to Sir John Millais, have lacked the ambition to interpret some scene or character of Shakespearean drama.

In America no less enthusiasm for Shakespeare has been manifested. Editors and critics are hardly less numerous there than in England, and some criticism from American pens, like that of James Russell Lowell, has reached the highest literary level. Nowhere, probably, has more labour been devoted to the study of his works than that devoted by Mr. H. H. Furness of Philadelphia to the preparation of his 'New Variorum' edition. The Barton collection of Shakespearesana in the Boston Public Library is one of the most valuable extant: the elaborate catalogue (1878-80) contains some 2,500 entries. First of Shakespeare's plays to be represented in America, 'Richard III' was performed in New York in March 1760. More recently Edwin Forrest (1806-1872), Junius Brutus Booth, Edwin Booth, Charlotte Cushman, and Miss Ada Rehan have maintained on the American stage the great traditions of Shakespearean acting; while Mr. E. A. Abbey has devoted high artistic gifts to pictorial representation of scenes from the plays.

The bible, alone of all literary compositions, has been translated more frequently or into a greater number of languages than the works of Shakespeare. The progress of his reputation in Germany, France, Italy, and Russia was somewhat slow at the outset. But in Germany the poet has received for nearly a century and a half a recognition scarcely less pronounced than that accorded him in America and in his own country. Three of Shakespeare's plays, now in the Zurich Library, were brought thither by J. R. Hess from England in 1614. As early as 1626 'Hamlet,' 'King Lear,' and 'Romeo and Juliet' were acted at

Dresden, and a version of the 'Taming of the Shrew' was played there and elsewhere at the end of the seventeenth century. But such mention of Shakespeare as is found in German literature between 1640 and 1740 only indicates a knowledge on the part of German readers either of Dryden's criticisms or of the accounts of him printed in English encyclopædias (cf. D. G. MORHOF, Unterricht von der deutschen Sprache und Poesie, Kiel, 1689, p. 250). The earliest sign of a direct acquaintance with the plays is a poor translation into German of 'Julius Cæsar' by Baron C. W. von Borck, formerly Prussian minister in London, which was published at Berlin in 1741. A worse rendering of 'Romeo and Juliet' followed in 1758. Meanwhile J. C. Gottsched (1700-68), an influential man of letters, warmly denounced Shakespeare in a review of Von Borck's effort in 'Beiträge zur deutschen Sprache' and elsewhere. Lessing came without delay to Shakespeare's rescue, and set his reputation, in the estimation of the German public, on that exalted pedestal which it has not ceased to occupy. It was in 1750, in a journal entitled 'Litteraturbriefe,' that Lessing first claimed for Shakespeare superiority, not only to the French dramatists Racine and Corneille, who hitherto had dominated European taste, but to all ancient or modern poets. Lessing's doctrine, which he developed in his 'Hamburgische Dramaturgie' (Hamburg, 1767, 2 vols. 8vo), was at once accepted by the poet Johann Gottfried Herder in the 'Blätter von deutscher Art und Kunst,' 1771. Christopher Martin Wieland (1733-1813) in 1762 began a prose translation which Johann Joachim Eschenburg (1748-1820) completed (Zurich, 18 vols., 1776-84). Between 1797 and 1838 appeared at intervals the classical German rendering by August Wilhelm von Schlegel and Ludwig Tieck, leaders of the romantic school of German literature, whose creed embodied, as one of its first articles, an unwavering veneration for Shakespeare. Schlegel translated only seventeen plays, and his workmanship excels that of the rest of the translation. Tieck's part in the undertaking was mainly confined to editing translations by various hands. Many other German translations followed—by J. H. Voss and his sons (Leipzig, 1818-1829), by J. W. O. Benda (Leipzig, 1825-8), by A. Böttger (Leipzig, 1830-7) and others. Most of these have been many times reissued, but Schlegel and Tieck's achievement still holds the field. Schlegel's lectures on 'Shakespeare and the Drama,' which were delivered at Vienna in 1808, and were translated into English in 1815, are worthy of comparison with those of Coleridge, who acknowledged their influence. Goethe poured forth, in his voluminous writings, a mass of squally illuminating and appreciative criticism (cf. Wilhelm Meister); and, although he deemed Shakespeare's works unsuited to the stage, he adapted 'Romeo and Juliet' for the Weimar Theatres, while Schiller prepared 'Macbeth' (Stuttgart, 1801). Heine published in 1838 charming studies of Shakespeare's heroines (English transl. 1895).

During the last half-century textual, æsthetic, and biographical criticism has been pursued in Germany with unflinching industry and energy; and although laboured and supersubtle theorising characterises much German æsthetic criticism, its mass and variety testify to the impressiveness of the appeal that Shakespeare's work has made to the German intellect. The vain effort to stem the current of Shakespearean worship made by the dramatist, J. R. Benedix in 'Die Shakespearemanie' (Stuttgart, 1878, 8vo), stands practically alone. In studies of the text and metre Nikolaus Delius (1813-1888) should, among recent German writers, perhaps be accorded the first place; in studies of the biography and stage history Friedrich Karl Elze (1821-1889); in æsthetic studies Friedrich Alexander Theodor Kreyssig (1818-1879), author of 'Vorlesungen über Shakespeare' (Berlin, 1856 and 1874), and 'Shakespeare-Fragen' (Leipzig, 1871). Ulrich's 'Shakespeare's Dramatic Art' (first published at Halle in 1839) and Gervinus's Commentaries (first published at Leipzig in 1848-9), both of which are familiar in English translations, are suggestive but unconvincing æsthetic interpretations. The German Shakespeare Society, which was founded at Weimar in 1866, has published forty-three year-books (edited successively by von Bodenstedt, Delius, Elze, F. A. Leo, and Prof. Brandl), which contain many useful contributions to Shakespearean study.

Shakespeare has been no less effectually nationalised on the German stage. The three great actors—Friedrich Ulrich of Hamburg, Ludwig Devrient (1784-1832), and his nephew Gustav Emil Devrient (1803-1872)—largely derived their fame from their successful assumptions of Shakespearean characters. Another of Ludwig Devrient's nephews, Eduard (1801-1877), also an actor, prepared, with his son Otto, an acting German edition (Leipzig, 1878, and following years). An acting edition by Wilhelm Oechelhaeusser, appeared previously at Berlin in 1871. As many as twenty-eight of the thirty-seven plays assigned to Shakespeare are now on recognised lists of German acting plays (cf. Jahrbuch der Deutsche Shakespeare-Gesellschaft for 1894). In 1895 as many as 706 performances of twenty-five of Shakespeare's plays were given in German theatres (ib. for 1896, p. 438). 'Othello,' 'Hamlet,' and 'The Taming of the Shrew' usually prove most popular. Of the many German composers who have worked on Shakespearean themes, Mendelssohn (in 'Midsummer Night's Dream'), Schumann, and Franz Schubert have achieved the greatest success.

In France Shakespeare won recognition after a longer struggle than in Germany.

In France. Cyrano de Bergerac (1619-1655) plagiarised 'Cymbeline,' 'Hamlet,' and 'The Merchant of Venice' in his 'Agrippina.' About 1680 Nicolas Clement, Louis XIV's librarian, allowed Shakespeare imagination, natural thoughts, and ingenious expression, but deplored his obscenity (JUSSE-RAND, A French Ambassador, p. 56). Half a century elapsed before French public attention was again directed to Shakespeare (cf. AL. SCHMIDT, Voltaire's Verdient von der Einführung Shakespeares in Frankreich, Königsberg, 1864). The Abbé Prévost, in his periodical 'Le Pour et Contre' (1733, et seq.), acknowledged his power. But it is to Voltaire that his countrymen owe, as he himself boasted, their first effective introduction. Voltaire studied Shakespeare thoroughly on his visit to England between 1726 and 1729, and his influences is visible in his

Voltaire. own dramas. In his 'Lettres Philosophiques' (1731), afterwards reissued as 'Lettres sur les Anglais,' 1734 (Nos. xviii. and xix.), and in his 'Lettre sur la Tragédie' (1731), he expressed admiration for Shakespeare's genius, but attacked his want of taste and art. He described him as 'le Corneille de Londres, grand fou d'ailleurs, mais il a des morceaux admirables.' Writing to the Abbé des Fontaines in November 1735, Voltaire admitted many merits in 'Julius Cæsar,' on which he published 'Observations' in 1784. Johnson replied to Voltaire's general criticism in the preface to his edition (1765), and Mrs. Elizabeth Montagu [q. v.] in 1769 in a separate volume, which was translated into French in 1777. Diderot made, in his 'Encyclopédie,' the first stand in France against the Voltairean position, and increased opportunities of studying Shakespeare's works increased the poet's vogue. Twelve plays were translated in De La Place's 'Théâtre Anglais' (1745-8). Jean-François Ducis (1733-1816) adapted without much insight six plays for the French stage, beginning in 1769 with 'Hamlet,' which was acted with applause. In 1776 Pierre Le Tourneur began

On the German stage.

Ludwig Schroeder (1744-1816) of Hamburg, Ludwig Devrient (1784-1832), and his nephew Gustav Emil Devrient (1803-1872)—largely derived their fame from their successful assumptions of Shakespearean characters. Another of Ludwig Devrient's nephews, Eduard (1801-1877), also an actor, prepared, with his son Otto, an acting German edition (Leipzig, 1878, and following years). An acting edition by Wilhelm Oechelhaeusser, appeared previously at Berlin in 1871. As many as twenty-eight of the thirty-seven plays assigned to Shakespeare are now on recognised a bad prose translation (completed in 1782) of all Shakespeare's plays and declared him to be 'the god of the theatre.' Voltaire protested against this estimate in a new remonstrance consisting of two letters, of which the first was read before the French Academy on 25 Aug. 1776. Here Shakespeare was described as a barbarian, whose works—'a huge dunghill'—concealed some pearls. Although Voltaire's censure was rejected by the majority of later French critics, it expressed a sentiment born of the genius of the nation, and made an impression that was only gradually effaced. Marmontel, La Harpe, Marie-Joseph Chénier, and Chateaubriand, in his 'Essai sur Shakespeare,' 1801, inclined to Voltaire's view; but Madame de Staël wrote effectively on the other side in her 'De la Littérature,' 1804 (i. caps. 13, 14, ii. 5). The revision of Le Tourneur's translation by François Guizot and A. Pichot in 1821 gave Shakespeare a fresh advantage. Paul Dupont, in 'Essais Littéraires sur Shakespeare' (Paris, 1828, 2 vols.), was the last French critic of repute to repeat Voltaire's censure unreservedly. Guizot, in his 'Sur la Vie et les Œuvres de Shakespeare' (reprinted separately from the translation of 1821), as well as in his 'Shakespeare et son Temps' (1852); Villemain in a general essay (Mélanges Historiques, 1827, iii. 141-87), and Barante in a study of 'Hamlet' (ib. 1824, iii. 217-34), acknowledge the mightiness of Shakespeare's genius with comparatively few qualifications. Other translations followed—by Francisque Michel (1839), by Benjamin Laroche (1851), and by Emil Montégut (1867), but the best is that in prose by François Victor Hugo (1859-66), whose father, Victor Hugo, published a rhapedical eulogy in 1864. Alfred Mézières's 'Shakespeare, ses Œuvres et ses Critiques' (Paris, 1860), is a saner appreciation. Meanwhile 'Hamlet' and 'Macbeth,' 'Othello' and a few other Shakespearean plays, became stock-pieces on the French stage. Alfred de Vigny prepared a version of 'Othello' for the Théâtre-Français in 1829 with eminent success. An adaptation of 'Hamlet' by Alexandre Dumas was first performed in 1847, and a rendering by De Chatelain (1864) was often repeated. George Sand translated 'As you like it' (Paris, 1856) for representation by the Comédie Française on 12 April 1856. 'Lady Macbeth' has been represented in recent years by Madame Sarah Bernhardt, and 'Hamlet' by M. Mounet Sully of the Théâtre-Français (cf. LAOROX, Histoire de l'Influence de Shakespeare sur le Théâtre Français, 1867; Edinb. Rev. 1849, pp. 39-77; ELZE, Essays, pp. 193 sq.; M. JUSSELAND, 'Shakespeare en France sous l'Ancien Régime,' in Cosmopolis, Nov.-Dec. 1896, Jan.-Feb. 1897).

In Italy Shakespeare was little known before the present century. Such references as eighteenth-century Italian writers made to him were based on remarks by Voltaire (cf. GIOVANNI ANDRÉS, Dell' Origine, Progressi e Stato attuale d'ogni Letteratura, 1783). The French adaptation of 'Hamlet' by Ducis was issued in Italian blank verse (Venice, 1774, 8vo). Complete translations of all the plays made direct from the English were issued by Michele Leoni (in verse) at Verona 1819-22, and by Carlo Rusconi in prose at Padua in 1831 (new edit. Turin, 1858-9). 'Othello' and 'Romeo and Juliet' have been most often translated into Italian separately. The Italian actors, Madame Ristori (as Lady Macbeth), Salvini (as Othello), and Rossi rank among Shakespeare's most effective interpreters. Verdi's operas on Macbeth, Othello, and Falstaff (the last two with libretti by Doito), betray a close and appreciative study of Shakespeare.

In Eastern Europe, Shakespeare first became known through French and German translations. Into Russian 'Romeo and Juliet' was translated in 1772, 'Richard III' in 1783, and 'Julius Caesar' in 1786. In Russia. Sumarokow translated Ducis's version of 'Hamlet' in 1784 for stage purposes, while the Empress Catherine II adapted the 'Merry Wives' and 'King John.' Numerous versions of all the chief plays followed; and in 1865 there appeared at St. Petersburg the best translation in verse (direct from the English), by Nekrasow and Gerbel. A prose translation, by N. Ketzcher, begun in 1862, was completed in 1879. Gerbel issued a Russian translation of the 'Sonnets' in 1880, and many critical essays in the language, original or translated, have been published. Almost every play has been represented in Russian on the Russian stage (cf. New Shakesp. Soc. Trans. 1880-5, pt. ii. 431 seq.) A Polish version of 'Hamlet' was acted at Lemberg in 1797; and as many as sixteen plays now hold a recognised place among Polish acting plays. The standard Polish translation of Shakespeare's collected works appeared at Warsaw in 1875 (edited by the Polish poet Kraszewski), and is reckoned among the most successful renderings in a foreign tongue.

Other complete translations have been published in Hungarian (Budapest, 1864-5), in Bohemian (Prague, 1874), in Swedish (Lund, 1847-51), in Dutch, in Danish (1845-1850), and Finnish (Helsingfors, 1892-5). In Spanish a complete translation is in course of publication (Madrid, 1885 at seq.), and the Spanish critic Menéndez y Pelayo has placed Shakespeare above Calderon. In Armenian, although only three plays ('Hamlet,' 'Romeo and Juliet,' and 'As you like it') have been issued, the translation of the whole is ready for the press. Separate plays only have appeared in Welsh, Portuguese, Friesic, Flemish, Servian, Roumanian, Maltese, Ukrainian, Wallachian, Croatian, Finnish, modern Greek, Latin, and Hebrew; while a few have been rendered into Bengali, Hindustani, Marathi, Gujarati, and Urdu, Kanarese, and other languages of India, and have been acted in native theatres.

No estimate of Shakespeare's genius can be adequate. In knowledge of human character, in wealth of humour, in depth of passion, in fertility of fancy, in soundness of judgment, and in mastery of language he has no rival. His language and versification adapt themselves to every phase of sentiment, and sound almost every note in the scale of felicity. Although sudden transitions, elliptical expressions, mixed metaphors, obsolete words, indefensible verbal quibbles, and a few hopelessly corrupt readings disturb the modern reader's equanimity, the glow of the author's imagination leaves few passages wholly unilluminated. It is the versatile working of Shakespeare's intellect that renders his supremacy unassailable. His mind, as Hazlitt suggested, contained within itself the germs of every faculty and feeling. He knew intuitively how every faculty and feeling would develop in every conceivable change of fortune. Men and women—good or bad, old or young, wise or foolish, merry or sad, rich or poor—yielded their secrets to him, and his genius illumined in turn every aspect of humanity that presents itself on the highway of life. Each of his characters gives voice to thought or passion with an individuality and a naturalness that rouse in the intelligent playgoer and reader the illusion that they are overhearing men and women speak unpremeditatedly among themselves, rather than that they are reading speeches or hearing written speeches recited. The more closely the words are studied, the completer the illusion grows. Creatures of the imagination—fairies, ghosts, witches—are delineated with a like potency, and the reader or spectator feels instinctively that these supernatural entities could not speak, feel, or act otherwise than Shakespeare represents them. So mighty a faculty sets at naught the common limitations of nationality, and in every quarter of the globe to which civilised life has penetrated Shakespeare's power is recognised. All the world over, language is applied to his creations that ordinarily applies to beings of flesh and blood. Hamlet and Othello, Lear and Macbeth, Falstaff, Brutus, Romeo, and Shylock are studied in almost every civilised tongue as if they were historic personalities, and the chief of the impressive phrases that fall from their lips are rooted in the speech of civilised humanity.

[The scantiness of contemporary records of Shakespeare's career has been much exaggerated. An investigation extending over two centuries has brought together a mass of detail which far exceeds that accessible in the case of any other contemporary professional writer. Nevertheless many important links are missing, and at many critical points appeal to conjecture is inevitable. But if the general outline suggested by the fully ascertained facts be scrupulously respected, the result may be confidently regarded as true. Fuller, in his Worthies (1662), attempted the first biographical notice of Shakespeare, with poor results. Aubrey, in his gossiping Lives of Eminent Men (compiled before 1680; first printed in Letters from the Bodleian, 1813, and re-edited for the Oxford Univ. Press by the Rev. Andrew Clark 1898), based his ampler information on reports communicated to him by William Beeston (d. 1682), an aged actor, whom Dryden called 'the chronicle of the stage,' and who was doubtless in the main a trustworthy witness. A few additional details were recorded in the seventeenth century by the Rev. John Ward (1629-1681), vicar of Stratford-on-Avon from 1662 to 1668, in a diary and memorandum-book written between 1661 and 1668 (ed. C. A. Severn, 1839); by the Rev. William Fulman, whose manuscripts are at Corpus Christi College, Oxford (with interpolations made before 1708 by the Rev. Richard Davies, vicar of Saperton, Gloucestershire); by John Dowdall, who travelled through Warwickshire in 1693 (London, 1838); and by William Hall, who visited Stratford in 1694 (London, 1884, from Bodleian MS.) Phillips in his Theatrum Poetarum (1676), and Langbaine in his English Dramatick Poets (1691), confined themselves to criticism. In 1709 Nicholas Rowe prefixed a more ambitious memoir than had yet been attempted to his edition of the plays, and embodied some new local Stratford and London traditions with which the actor Thomas Betterton supplied him. A little fresh gossip was collected by William Oldys [q. v.], and was printed from his manuscript 'adversaria' (now in the British Museum) as an appendix to Yeowell's 'Memoir of Oldys,' 1862. Pope, Johnson, and Steevens, in biographical prefaces to their editions, mainly repented the narratives of their predecessors. In the Prolegomena to the Variorum edition of 1821 there was embodied a mass of fresh information derived by Edmund Malone [q.v.] from systematic researches among official papers at Stratford, at Dulwich (the Alleyn MSS.), or in the Public Record Office, and the available knowledge of Elizabethan stage history, as well as of Shakespeare's biography, was thus greatly extended. Francis Douce in his Illustrations of Shakespeares (1807), and Joseph Hunter [q.v.] in New Illustrations of Shakespeares (1846), occasionally supplemented Malone's researches. John Payne Collier [q.v.], in his History of English Dramatic Poetry (1831), in his 'New Facts' about Shakespeare (1835), his 'New Particulars' (1836), and his 'Further Particulars' (1839), and in his editions of Henslowe's Diary and the Alleyn Papers for the Shakespeare Society, while throwing some light on obscure places, foisted on Shakespeare's biography a series of ingeniously forged documents which have greatly perplexed succeeding biographers. Dyce specified the chief of Collier's forgeries in the second issue of his edition of Shakespeare (cf. G. F. Warner's Cat. of Dulwich MSS.) James Orchard Halliwell (afterwards Halliwell-Phillips) [q.v.] printed separately, between 1860 and 1884, in various privately issued publications, all the Stratford archives and extant legal documents bearing on Shakespeare's career, many of them for the first time, and in 1887 he published massive materials for a full biography in his Outline of the Life of Shakespeare (4th edit.). Mr. F. G. Fleay, in his Shakespeare Manual (1876), in his Life of Shakespeare (1886), in his History of the Stage (1890), and his Biographical Chronicle of the English Drama (1891), adds some useful information respecting Shakespeare's relations with his fellow-dramatists, mainly derived from a study of the original editions of the plays of Shakespeares and of his contemporaries; but many of his statements and conjectures are unauthenticated. A full epitome of the information accessible at date of publication is supplied in Karl Elze's Life of Shakespeare (Halle, 1876; English translation, 1888), with which Elze's Essays from the publications of the German Shakespeare Society (English translation, 1874) are worth studying. Prof. Dowden's Shakespeare Primer (1877) and his Introduction to Shakespeare (1893), and Dr. Furnivall's Introduction to the Leopold Shakespeare, are all useful. The present writer in 1898 brought out 'A Life of William Shakespeare,' often reprinted in England and America, and translated into German 1901. Shakespeare's Library (ed. J. P. Collier and W. C. Hazlitt), Shakespeare's Plutarch (ed. Skeat), and Shakespeare's Holinshed (ed. W. G. Boswell-Stone, 1896), trace the sources of Shakespeare's plots. Alexander Schmidt's Shakespeare-Lexicon, 1874 (ed. Sarrazin, 1902), and Abbott's Shakespearean Grammar, 1869 (new edit., 1897), are valuable aids to a study of the text. Useful concordances to the plays have been prepared by Mrs. Cowden Clarke (1845), to the Poems by Mrs. H. H. Furness (Philadelphia, 1862), and to plays and poems, in one volume, with references to numbered lines, by John Bartlett (London and New York, 1895). An unpublished glossary prepared by Richard Warner between 1760 and 1770 is in British Museum (Add. MSS. 10472-10642). Extensive bibliographies are given in Lowndes's Libr. Manual (ed. Bohn), in Franz Thimm's Shakespeareana (1864 and 1871), in the Encyclopædia Britannica, 9th edit. (skillfully classified by Mr. H. R. Tadder), and in the Brit. Mus. Cat. (the 3,680 Shakespearean titles are separately published); see also the present writer's introductions to the Oxford facsimile of the First Folio (1902) and the Poems and Parables (1905). For notices of Stratford, see R. B. Wheler's History and Antiquities (1806), John R. Wise's Shakespeare, his Birthplace and its Neighbourhood (1861), Shakespeare's Marriage, by J. W. Gray (1905), and the present writer's Stratford-on-Avon to the death of Shakespeare (1890, new edit., 1906). Wise appends a 'glossary of words still used in Warwickshire to be found in Shakespeare.' Nathan Drake's Shakespeare and his Times (1817) and G. W. Thornbury's Shakespeare's England (1856) describe Shakespeare's social environment. To the publications of the Shakespeare Society, the New Shakespeare Society, and of the Deutsche Shakespeare-Gesellschaft, and other critical works noticed in the text, may be added Shakespeare's Heroines, respectively by Mrs. Jameson in 1833 and Lady Martin in 1885; Dr. Ward's English Dramatic Literature (1876, new edit., 1898); Richard G. Moulton's Shakespeare as a Dramatic Artist (1885); Shakespeare Studies, by Thomas Spencer Baynes, 1893; F. S. Boas's Shakespeare and his Predecessors, 1895; Georg Brandes's William Shakespeare, in Danish (1895), and in English (1898); Madden's Diary of Master William Silence (new edit., 1907); and A. C. Bradley's Shakespearean Tragedy, 1904.]

THE BACON-SHAKESPEARE CONTROVERSY.—The apparent contrast between the homeliness of Shakespeare's Stratford career and the breadth of observation and knowledge displayed in his literary work has evoked the fantastic theory that Shakespeare was not the author of the literature that passes under his name, and previous attempts have been made to assign his works to his contemporary, Bacon. It is argued that Shakespeare's plays embody a general omniscience (especially a knowledge of law) which was possessed by no contemporary except Bacon; that there are many close parallels between passages in Shakespeare's and passages in Bacon's works, and that Bacon makes enigmatic references in his correspondence to secret 'recreations' and 'alphabets' which his alleged employment as a concealed dramatist can alone explain. Toby Matthew [q.v.] wrote to Bacon (as Viscount St. Albans) at an uncertain date after January 1621: 'The most prodigious wit that ever I knew of my nation and of this side of the sea is of your Lordship's name, though he be known by another' (cf. BIRCH, Letters of Bacon, 1763, p. 392). This unpretending sentence is distorted into conclusive evidence that Bacon wrote works or commanding excellence under another's name, and among them probably Shakespeare's plays. According to the natural interpretation of Matthew's words, his 'most prodigious wit' was some Englishman named Bacon whom he had met abroad—probably a pseudonymous jesuit like most of Matthew's friends. Joseph C. Hart (U. S. Consul at Santa Cruz, d. 1855), in his 'Romance of Yachting' (1848), first raised doubts of Shakespeare's authorship, and there followed 'Who wrote Shakespeare?' in Chambers's 'Journal,' 7 Aug. 1852, and an article by Miss Delia Bacon in 'Putnam's Monthly,' January 1856. On the latter was based 'The Philosophy of the Plays of Shakespeare unfolded by Delia Bacon,' with a neutral preface by Nathaniel Hawthorne, London and Boston, 1857. Miss Delia Bacon died insane on 2 Sept. 1859 (cf. Life by Theodore Bacon, London, 1888). Mr. William Henry Smith seems first to have suggested the Baconian hypothesis in 'Was Lord Bacon the author of Shakespeare's plays? A letter to Lord Ellesmere,' 1856, which was republished as 'Bacon and Shakespeare,' 1857. The most learned exponent of this strange theory was Nathaniel Holmes, an American lawyer, who published at New York in 1836 'The Authorship of the Plays attributed to Shakespeare,' a monument of misapplied ingenuity (4th edit. 1836, 2 vols.) Bacon's 'Promus of Formularies and Elegancies' (London, 1833), edited by Mrs. Henry Pott, a voluminous advocate of the Baconian theory, presses the argument of parallelisms between Bacon and Shakespeare. A Bacon Society was founded in London in 1885 to develop and promulgate the theory, and it inaugurated a magazine (named since May 1893 'Baconiana'). A quarterly periodical also called 'Baconiana,' and issued in the same interest, was established at Chicago in 1892. 'The Bibliography of the Shakespeare-Bacon Controversy' by W. H. Wyman, Cincinnati, 1884, gives the titles of 265 books or pamphlets on both sides of the subject, published since 1848; the list was continued during 1886 in 'Shakespeariana,' a monthly journal published at Philadelphia, and might now be extended to twice the original figure. The Baconian theory has found its widest acceptance in America. There it was pressed to most extravagant limits by Ignatius Donnelly of Hastings, Minnesota, in 'The Great Cryptogram: Francis Bacon's Cypher in the so-called Shakespeare Plays' (Chicago and London, 1887, 2 vols.), and by Mrs. Gallup, of Detroit, in 'The Bi-Literal Cypher of Francis Bacon,' 1900. Both writers thought to detect cipher-statements in the Shakespeare First Folio categorically stating that Bacon was author of the plays. Many refutations have been published of Donnelly's and Mrs. Gallup's baseless contention (cf. Nineteenth Cent. May 1887; Times, Dec. 1901-Jan. 1902.) S.L.

SHALDERS, GEORGE (1825?-1873), watercolour painter, born about 1825, began to exhibit in 1848, when he was resident at Portsmouth, contributing in that and subsequent years to both the Royal Academy and the Suffolk Street gallery. In 1863 he became an associate, and in 1865 a full member of the New Watercolour Society, at the exhibitions of which all his later works were shown. Shalders painted landscapes, chiefly views in Hampshire, Surrey, Yorkshire, Wales, and Ireland, which gained considerable admiration; he usually introduced cattle or sheep, which he painted with much skill. He died of paralysis, induced by overwork, on 27 Jan. 1873, at the age of forty-seven.

[Redgrave's Dict. of Artists; Art Journal, 1873; exhibition catalogues.] F. M. O'D.

SHANK, JOHN (1740-1828), admiral. [See SCHANCK.]

SHANKS, JOHN (d. 1638), actor, was long a resident in St. Giles's, Cripplegate, in the parish registers of which are recorded the births and deaths of various children. He speaks of himself in 1635 as an old man, and affirms that he was originally in the company of Lord Pembroke, and afterwards in the companies of Queen Elizabeth, James I, and Charles I. This would place his first appearance in the sixteenth century. In a list of players transferred from Charles Howard, earl of Nottingham, to Prince Henry, in 1603 according to Collier, 'more probably' 1608 according to Fleay, he stands thirteenth on the list. When most of the men were taken, 4 Jan. 1618, into the service of the prince palatine of the Rhine, he remains thirteenth among fourteen players. When, presumably about 1619, he joined the king's company, shortly before the confirmation of their patent, his name is last. Shanks was one of the players who in 1624 made 'humble submission' to the master of the revels on account of having without permission acted in the 'Spanish Viceroy.' His name appears twelfth of some twenty-seven players to whom on 27 March 1625 a grant was made for cloaks in which to attend the king's funeral. In the 1628 Shakespeare folio list of the principal players it is last but one. Wright (Historia Histrionica) asserts that Shanks used to act Sir Roger (the Chaplain) in the 'Scornful Lady' of Beaumont and Fletcher, played at Blackfriars Theatre subsequently to 1609. He had a small part in the 'Wild Goose Chase' of Beaumont and Fletcher, and a second in the 'Prophetess' of the same authors. In 1629 he was Hilario in Massinger's 'Picture.' In Sir Henry Herbert's 'Register' is an entry of a fee of 1*l.* from the king's company for Shanks's 'Ordinary.' On the strength of this, Malone mentions him as a dramatist. Collier reasonably holds that the piece was no more than the entertainment called a jig, in the delivery of which Shanks seems to have won some reputation. In a ballad dated 1602, and supposed to belong to 1625-30, called 'Turner's Dish of Stuff, or a Gallimaufry,' are the lines:

That's the fat fool of the Curtain,

And the lean fool of the Bull:

Since Shanske did learn to sing his rhimes,

He is counted but a gull.

This suggests that he was a successor of Tarleton, Kempe, Armin, and others. From the Ashmolean Museum Collier quotes a manuscript entitled 'Shanke's Song,' intended to ridicule Irish Catholics, and having a burden, 'O hone!' Shanks lived in Golden Lane, in which Henslowe's playhouse stood. After the death of John Heming [q. v.], one of the 'housekeepers' of the Globe, his shares in that theatre and the Blackfriars were sold in 1633 surreptitiously by his son William. From this William Shanks bought, according to his own statement, 'one part hee had in the Blackfriars for about six years then to come at the yearly rent of 62. 5s., and another part hee then had in the Globe for about two years to come, and payd him for the same two partes 1567.' A year subsequently he bought for 35*l.* one further part in the Blackfriars and two in the Globe, his entire purchase costing him 506*l.* Benfield, Swanton, and Pollard petitioned the lord chamberlain, Pembroke, for a compulsory sale to them of one share each from the largest shareholders, Shanks and the Burbages. In spite of the counter petitions of Shanks—in one of which he complains that his fellows not only refused him satisfaction, but restrained him from the stage, and in another declared that in his long time he had made no provision for himself in his old age, nor for his wife, children, and grandchild—the application was granted, and the shares of Shanks in the Globe were reduced to two instead of three, and in the Blackfriars to one instead of two. According to the registers of St. Giles, a John Shancke married Elizabeth Martin on 26 Jan. 1630, while 'John Shanske, player,' was buried on 27 Jan. 1635 [i. e. 1636]. According to the 'Perfect Diurnal,' 24 Oct. 1642, another Shancke, a player, was one of three officers of the lord general (Essex) who, having run away from the army at the beginning of a fight, were sent to the gatehouse for punishment according to martial law. Shanks's name is spelt seven different ways.

[Collier's English Dramatic Poetry always open to some mistrust; Fleay's Chronicle History of the London Stage; Halliwell-Phillipps's Outlines; Wright's Historia Histrionica; Malone's

Historical Account of the English Stage; the 1623 folio of Shakespeare and the 1679 folio of Beaumont and Fletcher. The documents respecting Shancke's litigation are given in Halliwell-Phillipps's Outlines of the Life of Shakespeare (ed. 1886, i. 286 et seq.), and are well summarised in Fleay's Chronicle History of the London Stage.]
J. K.

SHANNON, EARL OF. [See BOYLE, HENRY, 1682-1704.]

SHARDELOWE or SCHERDELOW, SIR JOHN DD (d. 1344?), judge, appears as an advocate in the reign of Edward II (Foss), and on 28 Jan. 1332 was appointed a judge of the court of common pleas and received knighthood. Dugdale says that in 1339 he exchanged courts with a justice of the king's bench, but this must have been only some temporary arrangement, for he was sitting in the common pleas in 1340 (ib.; Year Book, Edward III, Mich. 1340). In December of that year he, in common with other judges, was arrested and committed to custody (see STRUBBS, Constitutional History, vol. ii. c. 16). He was afterwards restored to office, and sat in his court in 1342. He was a trier of petitions in the parliament of 28 April 1343, and died either in that or the following year. During his lifetime he settled his manor of Thompson, Norfolk, upon his elder son, Sir John de Shardelowe, and, in addition, died seised of the manor of Fulbourn and of lands in Leverington and Wisbeach in Cambridgeshire, of the manors of Barrow and Cowleng or Cooling, and of lands in Brandon, Cavenham, and elsewhere in Suffolk, and of land in Downham in Norfolk. He and his wife Agnes were buried in the parish church of Thompson. His younger son, Sir Thomas de Shardelowe, who appears to have been attorney-general in 1366, became heir to his elder brother, Sir John, was a commissioner of array in 1376 (Fœdera, iii. 1045), and was buried at Thompson. The two brothers founded a perpetual chantry or college, of a master and five clerks, in the church of Thompson in honour of St. Martin, the Virgin, and All Saints, and for the souls of their father and mother, and also joined in giving the advowson of the church of Cooling to the master and scholars of Trinity Hall, Cambridge. The elder brother, Sir John, appears to have died about 1369, for on 28 April of that year his widow Joan took a vow of chastity before Thomas Percy, bishop of Norwich, and remained until her death attached to the college at Thompson. The arms of Shardelowe, adopted by the college of Thompson, and represented in the church, were argent, a chevron between three cross crosslets fitchée azure. The male line of Sir John de Shardelowe failed in 1433.

[Foss's Judges, iii. 500; Dugdale's Orig. Jurid. pp. 39, 46, 102, and Chron. Ser.; Blomefield's Norfolk, ii. 367-9, 372, viii. 268-9, x. 186, ed. 1805; Chron. Angliæ, p. 10 (Rolls Ser.); Rot. Parl. ii. 136; Cal. Inquis. post mortem, ii. 117 (Record publ.)] W. H.

SHARESHULL, WILLIAM DE (fl. 1380), judge, is mentioned among the advocates in the 'Year Book' of Edward II, and also as receiving a commission of oyer and terminer on 22 Feb. 1327, and the two following years. In 1331, when he had risen to the rank of king's serjeant, he was appointed with others to assess a tallage in the counties of Oxford, Gloucester, and Berks (25 June). In the following year he was one of the council selected by the king to advise him, was ordered on 11 Oct. to attend the approaching parliament in Scotland for the confirmation of the treaty with Edward Balliol, and was made a knight of the Bath.

On 20 March 1333 he was made a judge of the king's bench, but was removed to the common pleas on 30 May following. In 1340 (30 Nov.) Edward III suddenly returned from the Low Countries, and removed the chancellor and treasurer and other prominent officials, among them Shareshull, on a charge of maladministration. He was reinstated, however, on 10 May 1342, and on 2 July 1344 he was made chief baron of the exchequer. On 10 Nov. 1345 he was moved back to the common pleas, with the title of second justice. He was also appointed one of the guardians of the principality of Wales during the minority of the king's son. On 26 Oct. 1350 he was advanced to the headship of the court of king's bench, and presided in it until 5 July 1357. While holding that office he declared the causes of the meeting of five parliaments, from 25 to 29 Edward III (1351-1355), and his functions seem to have more resembled those of a political and parliamentary official than those of a judge (Foss). In the last year of his chief-justiceship he was excommunicated by the pope for refusing to appear when summoned to answer for a sentence he had delivered against the bishop of Ely for harbouring a man who had slain a servant of Lady Wake.

According to Clarke's 'Ipswich' (p. 14), in 1344 some sailors, thinking Shareshull (he is there called Sharford) stayed too long at dinner, when he was holding assizes in that town, one of them mounted the bench and fined the judge for non-attendance. He took such offence at the joke that he induced the king to take away the assizes from the town and seize the liberties of the corporation into his own hands for about a year. Though retired from the bench, he occupied confidential positions as late as 1361. He lived beyond 1364, in which year he granted his manor of Alurynton in Shropshire to the Augustinian priory in Osney, in addition to lands at Sandford in Oxfordshire, which he had given seven years before. He was a benefactor also to the priories of Bruera near Chester, and Dudley. He left a son of the same name, who died in 1 Henry IV (1390-1400).

[Foss's Judges of England, iii. 504; Cal. Pat. Rolls, Edward III, 1327-38 passim; Rymer's Fœdera, ii. 991, iii. 126, 230, 467, 469; G. Le Baker, ed. Thompson, p. 72; Barnes's Edward III, pp. 212, 551.] W. E. R.

SHARINGTON or SHERINGTON, SIR WILLIAM (1495?-1553), vice-treasurer of the mint at Bristol, born about 1495, came of an old Norfolk family, and was the eldest son of Thomas Sharington (d. 1527?) and his wife Catherine, daughter of William Pirton of Little Bentley, Essex (Blomfield, Norfolk, x. 201-3). He entered the service of Sir Francis Bryan [q. v.], and subsequently became page of the king's robes. In 1540 he bought the dissolved Lacock Abbey, Wiltshire, for 783*l.*, and on 3 May 1546 he became vice-treasurer of the mint at Bristol (Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1547-1581, p. 8). He was made knight of the Bath at the coronation of Edward VI on 19 Feb. 1546-7. His position at the mint he used to perpetrate extensive frauds. In April 1547 the council forbade the coining of any more 'testons' or shillings, two-thirds of which were alloy. Sharington nevertheless bought up large quantities of church plate from the Somerset villagers, and during May, June, and July, coined it into testons. He also made over 4,000*l.* in three years by shearing and clipping coins, and to conceal his frauds he made false copies of the books of the mint and destroyed the originals. Fearing discovery, he entered into the plots of Thomas Seymour, baron Seymour of Sudelys [q. v.], who promised to protect him. Sharington in return lent Seymour money and put the mint at Bristol at his disposal; he also undertook to coin 10,000*l.* to be devoted to raising adherents for the admiral. With part of his ill-gotten fortune he purchased of the king Winterbourne, Aubrey, Charlton, and other manors, chiefly in Wiltshire, for 2,808*l.* But his frauds and Seymour's plots soon came to the knowledge of the government. On 6 Jan. 1548-9 Lacock Abbey was searched by the council's agents, and on 19 Jan. Sharington was arrested. He was examined several times in the Tower during January and February; at first he denied his frauds and all knowledge of Seymour's designs, but made full confessions on 2, 11, and 16 Feb. A bill for his attainder passed all its stages in both houses of parliament between 11 Feb. and 7 March. Seymour's connivance at Sharington's frauds was made one of the counts in his indictment (COBBETT, State Trials, i. 501-2); but Sharington, who threw himself on the king's mercy, was pardoned, and an act restoring him in blood was passed, 30 Dec. 1549-13 Jan. 1550.

In the following April he was again in employment, being commissioned to go to Calais and receive an instalment of the French purchase-money for Boulogne. He was also able to buy back his forfeited estates for 12,000*l.*; he seems in addition to have made a voluntary restitution of some property to the king, and Latimer, in a sermon preached before the king in the same year, extolled his example and described him as 'an honest gentleman and one that God loveth' (Frute-full Sermons, 1575, f. 115*b*). In 1552 he served as sheriff of Wiltshire. He died in 1558 (Acts of the Privy Council, 1552-4, p. 370). His portrait among the Holbein drawings in the royal library, Windsor Castle (Cat. Tudor Echib. p. 148), has been engraved by Dalton (BROMLEY, p. 11). He married (1) Ursula, natural daughter of John Bourchier, second baron Berners [q.v.]; (2) Eleanor, daughter of William Walsingham; (3) Grace, daughter of one Farington of Devonshire, and widow of Robert Paget, alderman of London. He left no issue, and was succeeded in his estates by his brother Henry.

[Letters and Papers of Henry VIII, ed. Gairdner, vols. xi-xv; Haynes's Burleigh Papers; Cal. Hatfield MSS. pt. i.; Cal. Harl. MSS.; Acts of the Privy Council, ed. Dasent; Lords' Journals, vol. i. passim; Lit. Remains of Edward VI (Roxburghe Club); Strype's Ecol. Mem. vol. ii. pts. i-ii.; Ruding's Annals of the Coinage, i. 313-4; Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation, ed. Pocock; Spelman's Hist. of Sacrilege; Tytler's Edward VI and Mary, i. 189; Froude's Hist. vol. iv.; Common Weal of England, ed. E. L. Lomond, 1893, xxiii. 117, 191; Wilts Archæol. Mag. xviii. 280; Visitation of Wiltshire, 1623, printed by Sir T. Phillips, 1823; Bowles and Nichols's Annals of Lacock Abbey, pp. 297-8.] A. F. P.

SHARMAN-CRAWFORD, WILLIAM (1781-1861), politician. [See CRAWFORD.]

SHARP. [See also SHARPE.]

SHARP, ABRAHAM (1651-1742), mathematician, younger son of John Sharp of Little Horton, by Mary, daughter of Robert Clarkson of Bradford (married 12 Dec. 1682), was born in 1651 at Little Horton, near Bradford, and baptised 1 June 1653 (pedigree in THORNTON'S Leeds, 1816, p. 87). After attending Bradford grammar school he was apprenticed to William Shaw, mercer of York, and then to a merchant at Manchester, but he gave up his business and moved to Liverpool, where he taught and devoted himself to mathematics. Here he met John Flamsteed [q.v.], by whom he was recommended to a post in Chatham dockyard. From about 1684 he seems to have been employed by Flamsteed in the newly founded Greenwich observatory. In 1688 he was employed to make a mural arc, the first of Flamsteed's instruments that proved satisfactory (cf. BAILY, Flamsteed, 1835, p. 55; FLAMSTEED'S Prolegomena to vol. iii. of the Historia Cælestis, 1725, p. 108). The mural was finished in fourteen months, costing Flamsteed 120*l.*; it was 79 inches in radius, and contained 140 degrees on the limb. Sharp left the observatory in August 1690, so that he might teach mathematics in London (cf. Flamsteed MSS. vol. iv. 4 Nov. 1690). Early in 1691, however, he removed to Portsmouth to take 'a clerk's place in the king's shipyard.' He retired in 1694 to Little Horton, calculating and making astronomical instruments and models, and in correspondence with scientific men (cf. Gent. Mag. 1781, p. 461). In a report on astronomical instruments (Phil. Trans. lxxvi. 1786) John Smeaton says: 'I look upon Mr. Sharp as having been the first person that cut accurate and delicate divisions upon astronomical instruments.' He calculated  $\pi$  to 72 places of decimals (HUTTON, Dict.). His book, Geometry Improved (1) by a Table of Segments of Circles, (2) a Concise Treatise of Polyedra, by A. S. Philomath, London, 1717, is remarkable for the great number of its calculations, among other things the logarithms of the numbers from 1 to 100, and of all the primes up to 1100, each calculated to 61 figures of decimals; and for the plates of solid figures cut by his own hand, which are very clear. From his correspondence, beginning 6 Feb. 1701 (noticed in BAILY'S Flamsteed) it appears that he continued to help Flamsteed. It was to Sharp and Crosthwait that the world was indebted for the final publication of the 'British Catalogue' (Z. c. p. 410). On 31 Aug. 1714 Flamsteed wrote to Sharp: 'I would desire you to calculate the eclipses of the [Jupiter's] satellites for the next year.' On 11 Oct. 1715 Flamsteed wrote him: 'Yours brought the eclipses of  $\gamma$  satellites for the next year, 1716. I thank you heartily for them.' After Flamsteed's death (4 June 1720), Crosthwait wrote to Sharp: 'Yours of the 20th May brought the most acceptable news of your kind offer to lay down the stars and draw the lines and divisions of all the maps of the constellations of the zodiac. When the world shall know that these were done by the hands of Mr. Sharp, it will make Mr. Flamsteed's works more valuable as well as more useful.' Others of Flamsteed's letters to Sharp are full of his complaints of Newton's double dealing. Sharp died near Bradford, Yorkshire, on 18 July 1742, aged 91 (Gent. Mag. 1742, p. 387).

[Authorities cited; Cudworth's Life and Correspondence of Abraham Sharp, 1889; Notes and Queries, 8th ser. xii. 344.] H. F. B.

SHARP, SIR CUTHBERT (1781-1849), antiquary, son of Cuthbert Sharp, shipowner, and of Susannah, sister of Brass Crosby [q.v.], lord mayor of London, was born at Sunderland in 1781, and received his education at Greenwich under Dr. Burney. There he formed a lasting friendship with Lord Lake and with Sir Edward Blakeney [q.v.] When he was eighteen years of age he served in Ireland during the rebellion as an officer in the fencible cavalry. When his regiment was disbanded, Sharp proceeded to Edinburgh, and in 1803 visited Paris, where he was surprised by the resumption of hostilities (at the conclusion of the peace of Amiens), and detained, with other English visitors, as a prisoner of war. But by the influence of Regnier, the minister of justice, whose friendship he had acquired, he was released on parole, and after a few years was allowed to pass into England.

Sharp settled at Hartlepool and devoted himself to the study of local antiquities. In 1816 he acted as mayor, and was knighted on the occasion of a visit of the prince regent. In the same year appeared his first book, 'The History of Hartlepool' (2nd ed. 1851), by which his reputation as an antiquary was established. Sharp came to know Surtees, the historian of Durham, and rendered him valuable assistance in compiling local genealogies. His contributions to Surtees's 'History of Durham' were distinguished by the initials C. S. surmounted by a rose.

In 1823 Sharp was appointed collector of customs at Sunderland, but continued his study of local antiquities. In 1840 appeared his 'Memorials of the Rebellion of 1669', based on the Bowes MSS. In 1845 he was promoted to the post of collector of customs at Newcastle-on-Tyne, where he resided until his death on 17 Aug. 1849.

His other works include: 1. 'A Brief Summary of a Manuscript formerly belonging to Lord William Howard', 1819, 8vo. 2. 'Ex- cerpta Memorabilia e Registris Parochialibus Com. Pal. Dunelm.' 8vo, in three parts, 1819, 1826, 1841; published in one volume in 1841. 3. 'A List of the Knights and Burgesses who have represented the County and City of Durham in Parliament.' Durham 1826, 4to; 2nd ed. Sunderland, 1833. 4. 'Poems,' Sunderland, 1823, 12mo. 5. 'The Life of Ambrose Barnes, sometime Alderman of Newcastle,' 1828, 8vo. 6. 'The Worme of Lambton,' a legend, 1830, 4to. He also compiled a 'Catalogue' of his manuscripts, 1829, 8vo.

[Gent. Mag. 1818 i. 534, 1811 ii. 61, 1849 ii. 428-30; Athenæum, 1849, p. 913.] E. I. C.

SHARP, GRANVILLE (1735-1813), philanthropist, pamphleteer, and scholar, born at Durham on 10 Nov. 1735 (old style), was ninth and youngest son of Thomas Sharp (1693-1758) [q.v.] and grandson of John Sharp [q.v.], archbishop of York. He was educated at Durham grammar school, but his father, though archdeacon of Northumberland, was possessed of small means and a large family, and in May 1750 Granville was apprenticed to one Halsey, a quaker linendraper of Tower Hill, London. He served successively under a quaker, a presbyterian, an Irish Roman catholic, and an atheist. During his scanty leisure he taught himself Greek and Hebrew, and in August 1757 he became a freeman of the city of London as a member of the Fishmongers' Company. In June 1758 he obtained a post in the ordnance department, and in 1764 was appointed a clerk in ordinary, being removed to the minuting branch. In the following year he published 'Remarks' on Benjamin Kennicott's 'Catalogue of the Sacred Vessels restored by Cyrus,' &c., defending 'the present text of the old Testament' against the charge of corruption in the matter of proper names and numbers; a second edition of Sharp's work was published in 1776. This was followed in 1767 by a 'Short Treatise on the English Tongue' (two editions), and in 1768 by 'Remarks on several very important Prophecies, in five parts' (2nd ed. 1775). In 1767 his uncle, Granville Wheler, offered him the living of Great Leek, Nottinghamshire, but Sharp refused to take orders.

Meanwhile he had become involved in the struggle for the liberation of slaves in England. In 1765 he befriended a negro, Jonathan Strong, whom he found in a destitute condition in the streets, where he had been abandoned by his master, one David Lisle. Two years later Lisle threw Strong into prison as a runaway slave, but Sharp procured his release and prosecuted Lisle for assault and battery. An action was then brought against Sharp for unlawfully detaining the property of another; his legal advisers said they were not prepared to resist it in face of the declaration of Yorke and Talbot in 1729, affirming that masters had property in their slaves even when in England. Mansfield also declared against him, and Blackstone lent the weight of his authority to the same opinion. For the next two years Sharp devoted his leisure to researches into the law of personal liberty in England. His results were published in 1769 as 'A Representation of the Injustice . . . of tolerating Slavery,' to which he added an 'Appendix' in 1772. Meanwhile Sharp interested himself in other cases similar to Strong's, and the struggle was fought out in the law courts with varying success for three years longer. It was finally decided by the famous case of James Sommersett (see HARGRAVE, An Argument in the Case of J. Sommersett, 1772; CLARKE, Hist. of the Rise . . . of the Movement for the Abolition of Slavery, 1808, i. 66-78; and tracts in British Museum Library catalogued under 'Sommersett, James'). After three hearings the judges laid down the momentous principle 'that as soon as any slave sets his foot upon English territory, he becomes free.' This first great victory in the struggle for the emancipation of slaves was entirely due to Sharp, who, 'though poor and dependent and immersed in the duties of a toilsome calling, supplied the money, the leisure, the perseverance, and the learning required for this great controversy' (SIR JAMES STEPHEN, Essays in Eccl. Biogr. 1860, p. 540).

This question did not exhaust Sharp's benevolent energies. In addition to his researches in early English constitutional history and other studies, he spent much time and labour in searching for documents to prove the claim of Henry Willoughby, then a tradesman, to the barony of Willoughby of Parham, a claim which was established by resolution of the House of Lords on 27 March 1767. He took part in the opposition to the attempt to rob the Duke of Portland of the forest of Inglewood and castle of Carlisle, and published in 1779 a tract 'Concerning the Doctrine of Nullum tempus occurrit Regi,' on which the crown proceedings were based [see LOWTHER, JAMES, EARL OF LONSDALE; BENTINCK, WILLIAM HENRY CAVENDISH, third DUKE OF PORTLAND]. He also agitated vehemently against the reported determination of the government to extirpate the aboriginal Caribbees in the West Indies, pressing his views in person on Lord Dartmouth, the secretary of state. His sympathies were easily enlisted on behalf of the American colonies, and in 1774 he published 'A Declaration of the People's Natural Right to a Share in the Legislature.' When the rupture became complete, he resigned his office in the ordnance department (31 July 1776) rather than assist in despatching war material to the colonies. He was now left without means, having spent his small patrimony in the cause of emancipation; but his brothers, William and James, who were then in a prosperous position, made provision for him.

Sharp's philanthropic activity now redoubled; in October General James Edward Oglethorpe [q. v.] sought his acquaintance, and Sharp joined in Oglethorpe's crusade against the press-gang. He wrote an introduction to the general's 'Sailor's Advocate,' and 'moved all the powers of his age, political and intellectual, to abolish the impressment of seamen' (ib. pp. 638-9; HOARE, pp. 108-70). In 1778 he published an 'Address to the People,' denouncing the arbitrary conduct of Lord North's ministry, and he vigorously supported the cause of political reform in England and legislative freedom in Ireland. On the close of the American war he started a movement for the introduction of episcopacy into the now independent states, in the course of which he corresponded with Franklin, Jay, and Adams. He was aided by Thomas Secker [q. v.], archbishop of Canterbury, and his efforts were crowned with success by the consecration of the bishops of New York and Pennsylvania by Secker in 1787. For his efforts in this cause he was made an honorary LL.D. by Harvard University, Providence College, Rhode Island, and William and Mary College, Williamsburg.

But the abolition of slavery was still the main object of Sharp's life. In 1776 he published no less than five tracts on the subject, and in 1779 he began corresponding with many bishops with a view to establishing a society for the abolition of slavery. It was founded in 1787, the original members being all quakers except two, and Sharp as 'father of the movement in England' was appointed chairman. He took an active part in the movement, frequently interviewing Pitt, and after the French revolution broke out corresponded with La Fayette and Brissot, the leaders of a similar movement in France. Meanwhile the number of liberated slaves in England became a source of serious embarrassment, and as early as 1783 Sharp had conceived the idea of establishing a colony of freed slaves on the coast of Africa; Sierra Leone was finally selected as the site, and in 1786 Sharp published a 'Short Sketch of the Temporary Regulations for the intended Settlement near Sierra Leona' [sic], which reached a third edition in 1788; after some assistance had been obtained from the government, the first cargo of freed slaves sailed on 8 April 1787. In 1789 a company called the St. George's company was formed to manage the settlement, and Sharp was one of the original directors, but after experiencing many difficulties it surrendered to the crown on 1 Jan. 1808 [see MACAULAY, ZACHARY].

During the last years of his life Sharp took a prominent part in founding the British and Foreign Bible Society [see SHORE, JOHN, LORD THIRMOUTH], and was chosen chairman at the inaugural meetings in May 1804 (OWEN, Hist. Brit. and For. Bible Soc.). He helped to found the African institution in 1807 and the Society for the Conversion of the Jews in 1808. He had been since 1785 a member of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and in 1813 was first chairman of the Protestant Union designed to oppose catholic emancipation. But his chief work in later years was an important contribution to New Testament scholarship in the shape of 'Remarks on the Uses of the Definitive Article in the Greek Text of the New Testament,' Durham, 1798 (2nd ed. 1802; 3rd ed. 1803). 'Granville Sharp's canon,' as the rule here laid down has since been known, is that 'when two personal nouns of the same case are connected by the copulative καί, if the former has the definite article and the latter has not, they both belong to the same person,' e.g. in τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡμῶν καὶ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, 'our God and Lord Jesus Christ,' 'God' and 'Jesus' are one and the same person. The canon is a crucial one in connection with the unitarian controversy; it was attacked by Gregory Blunt in 1803, and Calvin Winstanley in 1805, and defended by Christopher Wordsworth (1774-1846) [q. v.] in 'Six Letters to Granville Sharp,' 1802, by Thomas Burgess [q. v.], bishop of St. Davids, in 1810, and by Thomas Fanshawe Middleton [q. v.], afterwards bishop of Calcutta, in his 'Doctrine of the Greek Article,' 1808 (cf. ALFORD, Greek Testament, iii. 419-20).

Sharp's irrepressible enthusiasm led him into many eccentric opinions. During his latter years he wrote a number of tracts to prove the approaching fulfilment of scripture prophecies. On one occasion he attempted to convince Fox that Napoleon was the 'Little Horn' mentioned by Daniel. At a public meeting presided over by the Duke of Gloucester, he proposed to cure all ills in Sierra Leone by introducing King Alfred's system of frankpledge, and suggested that the soldiery in the Peninsula should be provided with portable bales of wool, which would form an impregnable rampart against the enemy in case of attack. Nevertheless Sir James Stephen attributes to Sharp 'the most inflexible of human wills united to the gentlest of human hearts,' and declares that 'as long as Granville Sharp survived it was too soon to proclaim that the age of chivalry was gone' (Ecc. Biogr. 1800, p. 538).

Sharp, who was unmarried, chiefly lived in rooms in Garden Court, Temple. He died at Fulham on 6 July 1813, at the house of his sister-in-law, Mrs. William Sharp. He was buried in the family vault in Fulham churchyard, where there is an inscription to his memory; another memorial, with an inscription and medallion portrait to him, was placed by the African Institution in the Poets' Corner, Westminster Abbey (engraved in the 'Gentleman's Magazine,' 1818, ii. 489). A portrait drawn by George Dance, R.A., and engraved by Henry Meyer, is prefixed to Prince Hoare's 'Memoirs of Granville Sharp,' 1820.

Hoare's 'Memoirs' (pp. 487-96) contains a complete list of Sharp's works, numbering sixty-one. The more important, besides those already mentioned, are: 1. 'Remarks on the Opinions of the most celebrated Writers on Crown Law . . .,' 1773. 2. 'The Law of Retribution, or a Serious Warning to Great Britain and her Colonies . . . of God's Temporal Vengeance against Tyrants, Slaveholders, and Oppressors,' 1776. 3. 'The just Limitation of Slavery in the Laws of God,' 1776, in reply to Thomas Thompson (J. 1753-1772) [q. v.]. 4. 'An Essay on Slavery,' 1778. 5. 'The Law of Liberty or Royal Law,' 1778. 6. 'The Law of Passive Obedience,' 1776. 7. 'A Defence . . . of the Right of the People to elect Representatives for every Session of Parliament,' 1780 (5th ed. same year). 8. 'An Account of the Ancient Division of the English People into Hundreds and Tithings,' 1784. 9. 'An Account of the Constitutional English Polity of Congregational Courts, and more particularly of . . . the View of Frankpledge,' 1786. 10. 'An English Alphabet for the Use of Foreigners,' 1786. 11. 'A General Plan for laying out Towns and Townships on the new-acquired Lands in the East Indies, America, or elsewhere,' 1794 (2nd ed. 1804). 12. 'Serious Reflections on the Slave Trade and Slavery,' 1805. 13. 'Extract of a Letter on the proposed Catholic Emancipation,' 1805. 14. 'A Dissertation on the Supreme Divine Right of the Messiah,' 1806. 15. 'A Letter in Answer to some of the leading Principles of the People called Quakers,' 1807. The following tracts are of some note: 'On the Law of Nature' (1777; 2nd ed. 1809); 'The Ancient and only True Legal Means of National Defence by a free Militia' (3rd ed. 1782); 'On Duelling' (1790); 'Three Tracts on the Syntax and Pronunciation of the Hebrew Tongue' (1804), and on 'The System of Colonial Law' (1807).

[The Memoirs of Granville Sharp by Prince Hoare, 1820, 4to, were compiled from Sharp's manuscripts; the publication of a selection of his letters was projected but not carried out; see also Gent. Mag. 1813 ii. 89-90, 1814 ii. 431, 1818 ii. 489; Georgian Era, iii. 552; Nichols's Lit. Anecdotes of the Eighteenth Century; Sir James Stephen's Essays in Eccl. Biogr.; Wordsworth's Eccl. Biogr. 1818, pref.; Fleming's Papacy, 1848, p. 43; Faulkner's Fulham; Stanley's Memorials of Westminster Abbey, pp. 248, 280, 316; Clarkson's History of the Abolition of Slavery, i. 66-78; Catalogue of Devonshire House Portraits; Trevelyan's Life of Macaulay, i. 11; works in British Museum Library.] A. F. P.

SHARP, JACK (d. 1431), lollard rebel, was a weaver of Abingdon. His real name is given in the official documents as William Perkins (Ordinances of Privy Council, iv. 100, 107), but some of the chronicles call him Mandeville (LELAND, Collectanea, i. 491; FABYAN, p. 602; 'ganeo trino nomine nominatus'—AMUNDDEHAM, i. 63). In the spring of 1431, when he was bailiff of Abingdon, Perkins placed himself at the head of a movement among the lollards of the southern midlands against the stern repression to which they had for many years been subjected. Under the assumed name of 'Jack Sharp of Wigmoresland' he began to circulate handbills reviving the scheme of 1410 for the diversion of church endowments to useful purposes (ib. i. 453). The proposal took the form of a petition to the sitting parliament, but the reference to Wigmore, the centre of the Duke of York's influence in the Welsh march, contained a veiled menace to the Lancastrian government. Rumour perhaps exaggerated their designs. Sharp was afterwards reported to have confessed 'that he would have made priests' heads as cheap as sheeps' heads, so that he would have sold three for a penny' (FABYAN).

The council empowered the Duke of Gloucester, who was acting as regent during the king's absence in France, to suppress the movement, and a reward of twenty pounds was offered to any who should bring to justice Sharp and the 'bill oasters and keepers' (Ordinances, iv. 88, 99, 107). On Thursday, 17 May, William Warberton (or Warbleton), who claimed to have denounced Perkins before the proclamation, was informed that he had taken refuge in Oxford, and secured his arrest (ib.; Issues, p. 415). The mayor of Salisbury also obtained a reward for assisting in establishing the identity of Sharp by arresting bill-distributors from Abingdon (Ordinances, iv. 99). Sharp was tried and condemned at Oxford before the Duke of Gloucester, and five days after his capture executed at Oxford or Abingdon (Chron. ed. Davies; FABYAN, p. 602; LELAND, i. 491). His head was set up on London Bridge, and his quarters distributed between Oxford, Abingdon, and other towns (GREGEOR, p. 172).

[Ordinances of the Privy Council, ed. Nicolas; Devon's Issues of the Exchequer; Leland's Collectanea, ed. Hearne; Amundesham's Annals in Rolls Ser.; Chron. ed. Davies, and Gregory's Chron. ed. Camden Soc.; Fabyan and Hall, ed. Ellis; Chron. ed. Giles, p. 18; Chron. of London, p. 119; Ellis's Original Letters, 2nd ser. i. 103; Ramsay's Lancaster and York.] J. T. T.

SHARP, JAMES (1618-1679), archbishop of St. Andrews, son of William Sharp, factor of the Earl of Findlater, by Isabel Lesley, daughter of Lesley of Kininvy, a relative of the Earl of Rothes, was born at Banff Castle, where his father then resided, on 4 May 1618. Sharp's grandfather, David Sharp, a native of Perthshire, has been sneered at as 'a piper' (Life of Mr. James Sharpe, printed in 1719), but if he played the bagpipes (which was by the strict covenanters accounted sinful), this was not his profession, for he became a successful merchant in Aberdeen, and took to wife a lady of good family, that of the Haliburtons of Pitour. Being intended for the church, Sharp entered King's College, Aberdeen, where he graduated M.A. in 1637. He is said to have been expelled from the college in 1638 for refusing to take the covenant; at any rate he went south to Oxford, where, according to his biographer, Thomas Stephen, he would have taken episcopal orders but for a serious illness, which made it advisable for him to return to Scotland. Not long after his return he was—on the recommendation, it is said, of Alexander Henderson [q. v.]—appointed professor of philosophy in the university of St. Andrews; and in 1648 he was presented by the Earl of Crawford to the church of Orail, where he was admitted on 27 Jan. 1648-9. In 1650 he was elected one of the ministers of Edinburgh by the town council, but his translation was refused by the presbytery, and, although agreed to by the general assembly, of which he was that year a member, the invasion under Cromwell prevented his acceptance of the call.

The proposal to translate Sharp to Edinburgh is evidence that he was already regarded as one of the leaders of the kirk. On the division of the kirk into resolutioners and protesters, he adhered to the resolutioners—that is, the more liberal and loyal party, who supported the proposal or resolution that those who had made defection from the covenanting cause should, on professing repentance, be admitted to serve in defence of the country against Cromwell. Of this party—which, though avowedly presbyterian, numbered many sympathisers with episcopacy—Sharp came to be regarded as the head.

In 1651 Sharp was seized by Cromwell's forces while attending a committee of the estates at Alyth, Forfarshire, on 28 Aug., and carried to London (BALFOUR, Annals, iv. 315). He remained a prisoner in the Tower until 10 April 1652, when he was admitted to bail on security not to go out of the city, nor beyond the late lines of communication, and to be of 'good behaviour' (Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1651-2, p. 213), and on 17 June he was permitted to return to Scotland on condition that he rendered himself to Major-general Deane (ib. p. 296). In the absence of Deane he, by another order of 1 July, delivered himself up to the governor of Edinburgh Castle (ib. p. 312). When he was set at full liberty is not stated, but in 1657 he was sent by the resolutioners to London to advocate their cause with Cromwell. Burnet affirms that the idea of sending him (or of choosing him) was suggested by the fact that 'he had some acquaintance with the presbyterian ministers whom Cromwell was then courting much' (Own Time, ed. 1838, p. 42). His mission was unsuccessful, but it is said he so impressed the Protector with his abilities that he remarked 'that gentleman after the Scotch way ought to be called Sharp of that ilk' (True and Impartial Account, p. 84).

When he began scheming for the Restoration in 1659, Monck bethought him of Sharp's political influence, and sent for him from Coldstream on his way south; Sharp immediately responded to the invitation, and on his arrival prepared the declaration in Monck's name which was read next day at the head of the army; and, being afterwards distributed throughout the country, caused more than half of Lambert's forces to desert to Monck. On parting with the English general, Sharp seems to have returned to Edinburgh to consult with the leaders of the kirk. To the rule of Cromwell neither party in the kirk had ever become reconciled. Charles II continued to be regarded throughout Scotland as the only rightful sovereign, and Cromwell was deemed but an English usurper. Monck was anxious to obtain the confidence of the kirk leaders, though he knew that they cherished aims which could never be realised. It was necessary to temporise; and that delicate and morally dubious work he committed to Sharp, who, it is plain, from the beginning was perfectly aware of the part he was expected to play. He was too able and acute to be gulled by Monck, too little of a bigot or visionary to cherish any real attachment to the covenant, and too ambitious to allow such an opportunity for advancement to pass unutilised. That Monck had made sure of his man is clear from a letter of Sir John Grenville to the lord chancellor, 4 May 1660, in which Grenville, on the recommendation of Monck, asks the lord chancellor to give Sharp credit 'because he looks on him as a very honest man, and as one that may be very useful to his majesty several ways, both here and in Scotland, especially in moderating the affairs of the kirk and our church, being a person very moderate in his opinion, and who hath a very good reputation with the ministers of both kingdoms, who must have some countenance for reasons I shall acquaint you with at our meeting' (Clarendon State Papers, iii. 741). Before the letter was written Sharp had been for some time in London, for in January 1660 he had been despatched thither with five ministers of Edinburgh to represent the views of the resolutioners. On 4 May he was sent by Monck to communicate directly with Charles at Breda, being further recommended through the Earl of Glencairn as a man entirely an episcopalian in principles and the fittest person whom he could trust to give him correct information regarding both church and state in Scotland.

According to Burnet, whose attitude is very hostile and depreciatory, Sharp 'stuck nsither at solemn protestation, both by word of mouth and letters, nor at appeals to God of his sincerity in acting for the presbytery, both in prayers and on other occasions, joining with these many dreadful imprecations on himself if he did prevaricate' (Own Time, ed. 1838, p. 60). In order the better to mask his designs, and also to effect the king's purpose, Sharp induced the king to write confirming the 'public resolutions,' and also 'presbyterian government as by law established.' While the letter tended to allay for the time the special anxieties of the kirk, it was calculated indirectly to pave the way for the introduction of episcopacy, since by the confirmation of the 'resolutions' it bade fair to revive in an acute form the old quarrel between the two parties, and to prevent the possibility of their common action. At the same time, the letter, as Sharp explained to the episcopalian nobles, bound the king to nothing, 'for his confirming their government as it was established by law could bind him no longer than while that legal establishment was in force' (ib. p. 75).

For a considerable time Sharp continued to act ostensibly as the representative of the resolutioners, while the main work given him to perform by the king was that of lulling presbyterian suspicion. Thus, when, by the act declaring illegal all leagues with any other nation made without the king's authority, the league and covenant made with England in 1643 was set aside as of no force for the future, Sharp explained to those whom he professed to represent that for the presbyterians to submit quietly to the act was the best way to gain their ends, as they would thus extinguish the jealousy which, on account of the covenant, the king might entertain towards them. By plausible and dexterous manœuvring he succeeded in preventing any representation being made to the king on behalf of the preservation of presbyterianism, and while assuring the king that it was only from the protesters that serious opposition to episcopacy was to be expected—the great body of the resolutioners being either lukewarm or really episcopalians—he afterwards excused himself for betraying his trust on the ground that no effort of his could have prevented the introduction of episcopacy. This, no doubt, was true; and it is also true that he occasionally in his letters dropped hints as to the king's preference, but these were mainly made with a view of showing the necessity of acting with prudence and forbearance. No doubt also Sharp, like many others who changed at this time to episcopacy, never was a zealous presbyterian. He had previously, it may be, merely submitted to it, and longed for an opportunity to cast it off. At any rate, believing that it was now doomed, he resolved to do the best for himself he could under the new régime; and, apparently acting on the maxim that all is fair in ecclesiastical politics, he seems to have had no scruples in playing what was beyond doubt a double part. The important service he had rendered to Monck and the king, and not lose his diplomatic skill and strong personality, marked him out for high promotion. Meanwhile he was named his majesty's chaplain in Scotland, with a salary of 200*l.* per annum, and on 16 Jan. 1661 he was appointed professor of divinity in St. Mary's College, St. Andrews. After the rising of the parliament of 1661, by which episcopacy was established, he was nominated archbishop of St. Andrews, and on 15 Dec. he and three other Scottish bishops were solemnly consecrated at Westminster. In May 1662 ten other bishops were consecrated, the framework of the new ecclesiastical system being thus finally completed. Leighton, the mild and saintly bishop of Dunblane, told Burnet that he made to Sharp a proposal for uniting the presbyterians and episcopalians, according to the scheme of Archbishop Ussher, and was 'amazed when he observed that Sharp had neither formed any scheme nor seemed so much as willing to talk of any' (Own Time, p. 93). Indeed, instead of this, he began to prepare the way for the extinction of presbyterianism by issuing a proclamation forbidding clergymen to meet as a presbytery or other judicatory until the bishops should settle a method of proceeding in them (ib.) Having gone to London in 1664 to complain of the want of vigour and spirit in the administration, he returned, invested with 'the title and style of primate of Scotland,' the first place being also assigned him at the privy council. No doubt he was convinced, and rightly so, that the scheme proposed by the amiable Leighton could never be more than a dream. It was quite impossible that in Scotland episcopalians and presbyterians could now dwell together in unity; and episcopacy, he clearly realised, could never be regarded as secure while presbytery was even tolerated. Thus, partly from the determination to discharge to the best of his ability the duties of the office he had undertaken, partly from the knowledge that only thus could he establish himself in power and in the king's favour, partly probably from a sincere contempt for the peculiar fanaticism of the kirk, he hesitated at no severity in enforcing the annihilation of covenanting principles.

Such extreme zeal in one who had not merely been a prominent leader in the kirk, but who, having been entrusted with the special mission of representing its views to the king, had been the main agent in betraying it, naturally aroused against him, among the extreme covenanters, an almost unspeakable hate. On 9 July 1668 he was shot at with a pistol in the High Street, Edinburgh, by James Mitchell, who, after escaping capture for several years, was ultimately executed in 1678 [see MITCHELL or MITCHELL, JAMES]. Mitchell's execution intensified the antipathy to Sharp; and moreover the covenanters had gradually been roused into resistance and into acts of retri-

sal. On 3 May 1679 a number of Fife lairds and farmers had assembled on horseback on Magus Muir, between St. Andrews and Cupar, in the hope of capturing or killing Carmichael, sheriff-substitute of Fifeshire, the main agent in the persecution of the covenanters in the shire, when the carriage of the archbishop himself was unexpectedly seen approaching. In part influenced by the superstitious conviction that God meant to deliver him into their hands, and by the consideration that it would be more effectual to remove the principal than the subordinate, but chiefly inspired by an overpowering passion of hate, they at once resolved on the archbishop's death. David Hackston [q. v.], laird of Rathillet, was in command of the party; but having a private cause of quarrel against the archbishop, he resolved to hold aloof, and the duties of leader were undertaken by Balfour of Burleigh [see BALFOUR, JOHN]. Two separate accounts of the murder, differing considerably in details, have been published, the one being probably supplied by the daughter of Sharp, who was with him in the carriage, the other by one of the covenanters; but both agree in regard to the substantial facts: viz. that he was shot at while sitting beside his daughter Isabella in the carriage; that, finding he was not slain, the assassins, in the belief that he was proof against bullets, compelled him to come out of the carriage; and that they then fell upon him in a most ferocious manner with their swords until he received his deathblow. The escape of the assassins to the west of Scotland and the consequent insurrection form the subject of Scott's 'Old Mortality,' in which the main historic facts are closely adhered to (see notes c and p; cf. Tales of a Grandfather, ch. li.; and art. GRAHAM, JOHN, of CLAYRHOEVE). Sharp was buried in the parish church of St. Andrews, where an elaborate marble monument, with a long inscription, was erected to his memory. His portrait, painted by Lely, belonged in 1866 to the Rev. F. G. Sandys Lumsdaine, and a copy is in the National Portrait Gallery, Edinburgh; it has been engraved by T. Dudley, D. Loggan (1675), and Vertue (1710).

By his wife Helen, daughter of Moncrieff of Randerston, he had two sons and five daughters: Sir William, who succeeded him in the barony of Scotscraig; John; Isabella, married to John Cunningham of Barns; Catherine; Margaret, married to William, lord Saltoun; and another, married to Erekrine of Cambo.

[Ravillae Radivivus, being a Narrative of the Late Tryal of Mr. J. Mitchell for an Attempt VOL. XVII.

on the Person of the Archbishop of St. Andrews; Barbarous Murder of Archbishop Sharp, 3 May 1679 (in verse), 1679; Some Account of the Horrid Murder committed on the late Lord Archbishop of St. Andrews, 1679; Some Account of what is discovered concerning the Murder of Archbishop Sharp, and of what appears to have been the Occasion thereof, 1679; Fanatical Moderation, or Unparalleled Villainy displayed: being a Faithful Narrative of the Barbarous Murder, &c., 1679 and 1711; Life of Archbishop Sharp, first printed in 1678, to which is added an Account of his Death, by an Eye-Witness, 1719; True Account of the Life of James Sharp, 1723; Stephen's Life and Times of Archbishop Sharp, 1839; Wodrow's History of the Kirk of Scotland; Kirkton's History of the Kirk of Scotland; Burnet's Own Time; Nicoll's Diary and Robert Baillie's Letters and Journals in the Bannatync Club; Keith's Scottish Bishops; Hew Scott's Fasti Eccles. Scot. A number of Sharp's letters are included in the Addit. MSS. in the British Museum; and thirty-four letters, written to him by the Duke and Duchess of Lauderdale, &c., were published in the Miscellany of the Scottish History Society, 1893.]
T. F. H.

SHARP, JOHN (1572?-1648?), Scottish theologian, was born about 1572. He studied at the university of St. Andrews, and received the degree of M.A. in 1592. In 1601 he became minister of Kilmany in Fife, a parish in the gift of St. Salvator's College, St. Andrews. He was appointed clerk to the assembly which met at Aberdeen on 2 July 1605 in opposition to the commands of James VI, who was taking decisive steps to repress the independence of the Scottish church (Scottish P. C. Reg. 1604-7, p. 472). In consequence Sharp and those present at the assembly were ordered to appear before the privy council on 24 Oct. When they presented themselves they declared the authority of the privy council incompetent to judge a purely ecclesiastical question. For this conduct Sharp and five other ministers were confined in Blackness Castle and served with an indictment to stand their trial for high treason before the court of justiciary at Linlithgow. There they were found guilty in January 1606, and on 23 Oct. banished for life (ib. pp. 83-5, 101-5, 112, 123-5, 134, 199; CALDERWOOD, Hist. of the Kirk, vi. 292-332). Sharp went to France, where in 1608 he was appointed professor of theology in the college of Die in Dauphiné. In 1618 Archbishop Spotiswood asserted that Sharp had written to him beseeching him to obtain his recall and promising submission. This statement was vehemently denied by Sharp's friends, and the letter itself was never produced. There is no doubt, however, that he would have welcomed a reconciliation on honourable terms, and he dedicated his 'Cursus Theologicus' to King James in the same year. In 1630 Cardinal Richelieu ordered him to leave France, where he had acquired considerable renown as a protestant theologian, and he came over to London. In the same year he became professor of divinity in the university of Edinburgh, and died about 1648, when Alexander Colvill succeeded him.
4 R

He published: 1. 'Tractatus de Justificatione hominis coram Deo,' Geneva, 1609 and 1612, 8vo. 2. 'Tractatus de misero hominis statu sub peccato,' Geneva, 1610, 8vo. 3. 'Cursus Theologicus,' Geneva, 1618, 4to; Geneva, 1622, 4to. 4. 'Symphonia Prophetarum et Apostolorum,' Geneva, 1625 and 1639, 4to.

[Scott's Fasti Eccl. Scot. ii. 497; McOrie's Life of Melville, 1st ed. ii. 263; Young's Life of Welsh, p. 169; Piteairn's Criminal Trials, ii. 494.] E. I. C.

SHARP, JOHN (1645-1714), archbishop of York, born at Bradford on 16 Feb. 1644-5, was the eldest son of Thomas Sharp, wet and dry salter, by Dorothy, eldest daughter of John Weddall of Widdington, Yorkshire. The family had long been settled in Bradfordale. Sharp's youngest brother, Sir Joshua (d. 1718), an eminent stationer, was sheriff of London in 1713 (NICHOLS, Lit. Anecd. viii. 364). His father, a puritan who enjoyed the favour of Fairfax, inculcated in him Calvinistic doctrines, but his mother, a strong royalist, instructed him in the liturgy. On 26 April 1660 he was admitted at Christ's College, Cambridge, and in the fourth year of his residence was made 'echolar of the house.' He attended the lectures of Thomas Burnet (1635?-1715) [q. v.] in natural philosophy, and gave much attention to chemistry and botany. In 1663 he graduated B.A., and began to study divinity. He also 'kept to hard study of the Greek authors' till 1667, when he 'commenced master.' Soon after, on the recommendation of Henry More (1614-1687) [q. v.], the Platonist, who had been pleased with his reading of the lessons in the college chapel, Sharp became domestic chaplain and tutor at Kensington House, in the family of Sir Heneage Finch [q. v.], then solicitor-general. He was ordained deacon and priest on 12 Aug. 1667 at St. Mary's, Westminster, by special faculty from Archbishop Sheldon. On 12 July 1669, together with other Cambridge men, he was incorporated at Oxford, on the occasion of the opening of the Sheldonian Theatre (WOOD, Fasti, ii. 811). Sharp remained in Finch's house till his marriage in 1676. In 1673 he was appointed, on Finch's nomination, archdeacon of Berkshire. Through the same influence Sharp became in 1675 prebendary of Norwich and incumbent of St. Bartholomew's, Exchange, London. The latter post he resigned the same year for the rectory of St. Giles's-in-the-Fields. When Finch became lord keeper and lord chancellor, Sharp acted as his adviser in the bestowal of ecclesiastical patronage.

After his marriage Sharp lived for four years in Chancery Lane with William Rawlinson, who had married his wife's sister. He soon gained the reputation of being one of the best preachers of the day. In 1679 he was made lecturer at St. Lawrence Jewry, where the Friday sermons had been much frequented since Tillotson delivered them. In the same year he was created D.D. at Cambridge by proxy. In 1680 he delivered sermons at the Yorkshire feast and at the election of lord mayor of London. He now removed to Great Russell Street, where he remained till he became archbishop. On 8 July 1681, 'at the intercession of the Duke of York and Lord Arlington,' he was named dean of Norwich; he retained the rectory of St. Giles.

In 1674 he printed a sermon attacking the dissenters. Dodwell defended it, and Baxter replied to Dodwell. In 1683-4, in two 'Discourses concerning Conscience,' Sharp amplified his argument, and maintained the necessity of dissenters' communion with the church (cf. BENNETT, Abridgment of the London Cases, Cambridge, 1700). Sharp's argument was employed in 1704 by a writer in favour of reunion with Rome, and a fresh controversy followed.

In 1685 Sharp drew up for the grand jury of London their address of congratulation on the accession of James II. On 20 April 1686 he became chaplain in ordinary to the king. But, provoked by the tampering of Roman Catholics with his parishioners, he preached two sermons at St. Giles's on 2 and 9 May, which were held to reflect on the king. Sharp assured Burnet that nothing of the kind was intended, and, to refute the charge, went to court to show the notes he had used. He was not admitted, and on 14 June Compton, bishop of London, was ordered to suspend him. He refused, but in an interview at Doctors' Commons on the 18th instant privately advised Sharp to 'forbear the pulpit' for the present (BURNET, Hist. Own Time, iii. 100 et seq.; cf. EVELYN, Diary, pp. 255, 257). His appeals to Sunderland and Middleton for full reinstatement met with no response. On 1 July, by the advice of Jeffreys, he left London for Norwich; but when he returned to London in December his petition, revised by Jeffreys, was received, and in January 1687 he was reinstated.

In August 1688 Sharp was summoned before the ecclesiastical commission for refusing to read the declaration of indulgence. He argued that though obedience was due to the king in preference to the archbishop, yet that obedience went no further than things licita et honesta. After the Revolution he visited Jeffreys (who had befriended him in the Tower) and 'freely expostulated with him upon his public actions, and particularly the affairs in the west.'

On 27 Jan. 1689 Sharp preached before the Prince of Orange, and three days later before the convention. On each occasion he prayed for King James, on the ground that the lords had not yet concurred in the abdication vote. The speaker of the House of Commons complained of the second sermon as an affront, and a hot debate took place; but, notwithstanding Evelyn's statement to the contrary (Diary, ii. 291), the preacher received the thanks of the house on 1 Feb. (Life of Sharp; MACAULAY, ii. 639). Nor was the court displeased. Sharp preached before Queen Mary on the first Friday in Lent, and 'was taken into no small favour.' On 7 Sept. 1689 he was named dean of Canterbury, in succession to Tillotson, and was appointed a commissioner for reform of the liturgy and the ecclesiastical courts. In 1690 he was offered his choice of the sees vacated by the nonjurors, but declined to accept any of them during the life of the deprived prelates, among whom were personal friends. William III was 'not a little disgusted' by his refusal; but Tillotson, now primate, who was Sharp's lifelong friend, intervened and induced him to give a promise to accept the see of York when it should fall vacant. A fortnight later Archbishop Thomas Lamplugh [q. v.] died, and on 5 July 1691 Sharp was consecrated by Tillotson. On 5 Oct. he took the tests in the House of Lords. He held the archiepiscopal see longer than any of his predecessors since the Reformation. He made elaborate inquiries into its rights and revenues, and drew up a manuscript account in four folios, which he bequeathed to his successors. It included the lives and acts of the archbishops from Paulinus to Lamplugh. Le Neve and Willis benefited by his labours. In 1693 he visited and regulated the chapter of Southwell, which had fallen into some disorder. When, in 1711, a great part of York minster was burnt, he raised almost a third of the sum necessary for the repairs. In dealing with his clergy he was firm but considerate. He consistently refused to be influenced in the distribution of his patronage by political motives, and declined to interfere in the conduct of parliamentary elections, even when applied to by Lady Russell and the Duke of Leeds. He attended York minster thrice a week, and himself preached about once a fortnight. He would not allow in the pulpit 'railing at dissenters,' and approved useful rather than showy preaching. He discouraged in his diocese the societies 'for the reformation of manners' which began to spring up about 1697, thinking their methods of doubtful legality. He interested himself in the condition of the distressed Scottish episcopal clergy both under William and Anne. He was often applied to in cases of conscience, and made converts among both nonjurors and dissenters, including William Higlen [q. v.] and Robert Nelson [q. v.], Bi-hop Bull's biographer. Baxter was intimate with him, and attended not only his sermons but his sacraments (SILVSTER, Life, p. 487).

With politics, when not affecting the church, Sharp rarely concerned himself. In April 1694 he took charge successfully, for Stillingfleet, of a bill dealing with small tithes. In 1692 he opposed the bill for annual parliaments as prejudicial to the prerogative. He was opposed to bills of attainder, and voted against that in the case of Sir John Fenwick (1645?-1697) [q. v.], notwithstanding an interview with the king at Kensington on 8 Dec. 1690. He signed the 'association' to protect William's life, but caused a definition of the word 'revenging' to be entered on the journals of the House of Lords. At the coronation of Anne, on 23 April 1702, Sharp delivered a short and impressive discourse (SIRICKLAND, Queens of England, viii. 150). According to the Duchess of Marlborough, he was selected as 'being a warm and zealous man for the church, and reckoned a tory' (Account of her Conduct, p. 134). He was appointed the queen's almoner, and was sworn of the privy council. He was also appointed a commissioner for the Scottish union, but took no part in the proceedings. Under Anne, Sharp occupied a very important position, which he never abused. In the words of his biographer, 'in church matters he was her principal guide, in matters of state her confidant' (sic). In one of their numerous private conferences (December 1700), Sharp noted in his diary that Anne said 'I should be her confessor, and she would be mine.' Although they were in general agreement, the archbishop occasionally gave votes against the queen's wishes. As her ecclesiastical adviser, he induced her to give back the revenues of the Savoy chapel, supported the bounty scheme and its extension to the Irish church, and acted as mediator in the disputes between the two houses of convocation. He was active in advocating the interests of foreign protestants at the time of the negotiations for peace. He gave a hospitable reception to the Armenian bishops, who came over in 1700 to raise money for printing bibles in their language; and to Arsenius, bishop of Thebais, who came from Egypt in 1718 (Lit. Anecd. viii. 250). From 1710 onwards he carried on a correspondence with Jablonski, chaplain to Frederick I of Prussia, with the object of solving the disputes there between Lutherans and Calvinists by means of the introduction of the English liturgy. The death of the king of Prussia put an end to the negotiations. The correspondence, collected by Thomas Sharp, son of the archbishop, and translated into French by J. T. Mussyon, minister of the French protestant chapel at St. James's, was published in 1757 for presentation to Frederick the Great (see Relation des mesures . . . pour introduire la Liturgie Anglicane dans le Royaume de Prusse et dans l'Electorat de Hanovre. Eclaircie par des lettres et autres Pièces originales, &c., with preface by Granville Sharp [q. v.] in Append. III. to Life of Archbishop Sharp).

Sharp procured the promotion of Beveridge, Potter, Prideaux, and Bull. Swift credited him and the Duchess of Somerset with helping to prevent his obtaining the see of Hereford, but hints that he regretted his action (vide 'The Author upon himself' in SWIFT'S Works, ed. Scott, 2nd edit. xii. 315-18; cf. Schutz to Robethon, February 1714, in MACPHERSON'S Original Papers, ii. 562; STRICKLAND, Queens of England, viii. 488; and art. SEYMOUR, CHARLES, sixth DUKE OF SOMERSET). The cause of offence was supposed to be Sharp's dislike of the 'Tale of a Tub.' It has been plausibly argued that Swift borrowed the plan of his satire from Sharp's own 'Refutation of a Popish Argument handed about in Manuscript in 1688' (see letter by 'Indagator' [Charles Clarke] in Gent. Mag. 1814, ii. 20-22).

On 10 May 1713 Sharp had his last interview with Anne, and obtained from her a promise to nominate as his successor at York Sir William Dawes, bishop of Chester. In December he fell ill, and on the 9th made the last entry in his diary, in which he had written weekly from 1691 till 1702 and daily since. He died at Bath on 2 Feb. 1714. He was buried in St. Mary's Chapel, York minster, where an elaborate Latin inscription was placed on his monument by Smal-ridge, bishop of Bristol. The epitaph is given in Willie's 'Survey of Cathedrals' (i. 60-3), and, with translation, in Wilford's 'Memorials of Eminent Persons' (Appendix).

Sharp was married, by Tillotson, at Clerkenwell in 1676 to Elizabeth Palmer of Winthorp, Lincolnshire. Of his fourteen children, only four survived him. Of these, John Sharp (1678-1727) of Grafton Park represented Ripon from 1701 to 1714; he was a commissioner of trade from 15 Sept. 1713 to September 1714 (HARPER), and died on 9 March 1726-7; in Wicken church, Northamptonshire, there is a monument to him and his wife Anna Maria, daughter of Charles Hosier of Wicken Park. Thomas (1698-1758), the youngest son and biographer of the archbishop, is separately noticed.

Mackay in 1702 described Sharp as 'a black man, one of the greatest ornaments of the Church of England.' All authorities agree in praising him as a preacher and divine. His tastes were liberal. 'He loved poetry all his life,' writes his son; and Onslow, in a note to Burnet, says that he was wont to say that the Bible and Shakespeare made him archbishop of York (Hist. of his own Time, iii. 100). He is also said to have 'admitted and admired the new philosophy of Sir Isaac Newton, of which he used frequently to discourse.' His hobby was the collection of coins. These he left to his friend Ralph Thoresby [q. v.], together with a manuscript treatise, 'Observations on the Coinage of England.' This is said to have been of great use to Thoresby and succeeding writers, such as Stephen Martin Leake [q. v.]. The manuscript, purchased by Gough in 1764 at the sale of Thoresby's museum, was printed in Nichols's 'Bibliotheca Topographica Britannica' (vol. vi.; cf. Lit. Anecdotes, ix. 97). Part of it also appeared in Ives's 'Select Papers' (1773).

As a controversialist Sharp was strenuous, but candid and urbane. Several of his sermons appeared in his lifetime. 'Fifteen Sermons on several Occasions' reached a seventh edition in 1788. Some sermons were contained in 'Protestant Writers' (vol. ix. 1762, 'Family Lectures' (vol. ii. 1791), Cochrane's 'Protestant Manual' (1839), Brogden's 'Illustrations of the Liturgy' (iii. 1842). Felton, in his 'Dissertations upon reading the Classics,' held them up as models of style. Evelyn, who heard him preach at the Temple in April 1696, notes that 'his prayer before the sermon was one of the most excellently composed I ever heard' (Diary, ii. 341). As compared with Tillotson, Burnet found him wanting in knowledge of the world. Of his general theological position Macaulay wrote that he was 'the highest churchman that had been zealous for comprehension and the lowest that felt a scruple about succeeding a deprived prelate' (Hist. iv. 43). The first collective edition of his works was published in seven volumes in 1754. An edition in five volumes appeared at Oxford in 1829.

A portrait, engraved by Scriven, representing Sharp in his robes, is prefixed to vol. i. of his 'Life.' Three others, engraved by E. Cooper, White (1691, prefixed to 'Sermons,' 1709), and F. Kyte, are mentioned in Bromley's 'Catalogue.'

[The Life of John Sharp, with three appendices containing 'select, original, and copies of original papers,' was written by his son Thomas Sharp, archdeacon of Northumberland. It remained in manuscript until 1825, when it appeared in two volumes edited by Thomas Newcome, rector of Shenley and vicar of Tottenham, who obtained access to it through his friendship with a great-granddaughter of the archbishop. The third appendix, added by the editor, contains letters of Granville Sharp. The Life, founded chiefly on the archbishop's shorthand diary, is supplemented by other contemporary sources, of which a detailed list copied from Cole (Addit. MS. 5880, f. 75) is given in the editor's appendix. The chief are Birch's Life of Tillotson; Whiston's Memoirs of himself and of Dr. Clarke, and his Historical Preface to Primitive Christianity Revived. The compiler of the article in the Biographia Britannica, 1760, had the help of Archdeacon Sharp. The article in Chalmers's Biogr. Dict. is founded also on Le Neve's Protestant Bishops, 1720, and Todd's Deans of Canterbury. Thoresby's Ducatus Leodiensis, ed. Whitaker, p. 37, gives the Sharp pedigree. Macaulay makes much use of the Life of Sharp. For a full statement of his theological position, see Abbey's English Church and its Bishops in the Eighteenth Century, i. 103-5; see too Carus's Life of Simeon, 1848, p. 20; Nelson's Bull, 1714, p. 279; Notes and Queries, 8th ser. xii. 345.] G. LE G. N.

SHARP or SHARPE, LEONEL (1559-1631), royal chaplain, second son of Robert Sharpe, a merchant, of London, and of Julian, eldest daughter of Sir Richard Mallorie, lord mayor, was born in 1559 (Harl. Soc. Publ. vi. 259). He entered Eton College in 1576, and proceeded as fellow to King's College, Cambridge. He graduated B.A. in 1581, M.A. in 1584, and received from the university the degree of D.D. before 1603. In 1588 he was present at Tilbury camp in the capacity of chaplain to the Earl of Essex, and was chosen, as he states, to repeat Elizabeth's celebrated oration to the whole army assembled there (Letter to Buckingham in Cubala sive Serinia Sacra, p. 259). In 1589 and in 1596 he accompanied Essex in his expeditions to Cadiz and Portugal, and his share in these exploits fostered his strong anti-papal and anti-Spanish tendencies (ib. p. 259; BRICH, Mem. of Elizabeth, ii. 17). In 1590 Sharp became rector of Malpas in Cheshire, and in 1597 of Tiverton and Stoke-in-Teignhead in Devonshire. When Essex was executed for treason, Sharp was banished to his Devonshire parishes. In May 1601, in a letter to Cecil, he professed the strongest personal affection for Essex, but asserted that when he became aware of his patron's disloyalty he had not hesitated for a moment to espouse the queen's cause (Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1601-3, p. 27). He was soon after appointed a royal chaplain. True to his policy of ingratiating himself with those in authority, Sharp celebrated the commencement of James I.'s reign by a laudatory sermon on Solomon and the queen of Sheba, preached before the university of Cambridge at St. Mary's. He also succeeded in obtaining the patronage of the Earl of Northampton, whom the new reign brought into prominence. In 1605 he became archdeacon of Berkshire and rector of North Moreton in that county. He was also about this time appointed chaplain to Henry, prince of Wales, in which capacity he addressed a congratulatory epistle to him on his escape from the gunpowder plot (BRICH, Life of Prince Henry, pp. 62, 415).

But his career at court soon terminated after Prince Henry's death in 1612. Already, in 1600, he had been summoned to clear himself to the council of the suspicion of endeavouring to stir up strife between the English and the Scottish factions at court (Cal. State Papers, Dom. Add. 1580-1625, p. 482). In 1614 John Hoskins (1566-1638) [q. v.], speaking in parliament concerning Scottish favourites, made an allusion to the Sicilian Vespers. On being called to account he pleaded that he did not understand the nature of his threat, but that it had been suggested to him by Sharp. Both Hoskins and Sharp, together with Sir Charles Cornwallis, who was also implicated, were committed to the Tower on 22 June. Sharp's health suffered from confinement, but he was not released till 15 June of the following year (ib. 1611-1618, pp. 237, 289, 344).

Sharp made several attempts to regain favour by means of obsequious sermons. He also wrote several letters to the king and to various ministers, in which he advocated the adoption of Elizabeth's domestic policy, and magnified the part which he had formerly played in state affairs (ib. 1628-9, pp. 96, 541; Cubala, pp. 285-7). In 1618, according to Chamberlain, he penned the defence of Sir Lewis Stukeley [q. v.] against the charge of betraying Sir Walter Raleigh (Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1611-18, p. 600). In the same year the university of Oxford conferred on him the honorary degree of D.D. In his later years he resided at Boughton Malherb in Kent, one of his parishes. There he died on 1 Jan. 1680-1, and was buried in the church, a marble monument marking his grave. About 1597 he married Ann, daughter of John Chichester of Hall in Devonshire.

He was the author of: 1. 'Dialogus inter Angliam et Scotiam,' Cambridge, 1603, 8vo. 2. 'Oratio Funebris in honorem Henrici Wall. Prin.,' 1612, London, 4to, with verses by his brothers Edward, Andrew, and William, prefixed; translated into English by Edward Sharp, 1616, 4to. 3. 'Novum Fidei Symbolum,' 1612, London, 4to. 4. 'Speculum Papæ,' 1612, London, 4to. The last two were jointly translated into English under the title 'A Looking-glass for the Pope,' 1623, 4to.

[Wood's Athenæ Oxon. ed. Bliss, iv. 625; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1600-1714; Harwood's Alumni Eton. p. 187; Wood's Fasti, ed. Bliss, i. 385; Lansdowne MS. 984, f. 92; Gardiner's Hist. of Engl. ii. 260; Birch's Court and Times of James I. i. 328; Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 34; Hasted's Kent, ii. 437; Gent. Mag. 1820, ii. 16; Le Neve's Fasti, ii. 636; Hazlitt's Handbook, p. 552] E. I. O.

SHARP, MICHAEL WILLIAM (d. 1840), painter, appears to have been born in London, and was a pupil of Sir William Beechey, R.A. He also studied in the schools of the Royal Academy. In 1813 he was settled at Norwich, where he appears to have been a pupil of John Crome [q. v.], with whom he lodged, and of whom he painted a small portrait, besides being godfather to one of his sons. Afterwards he became one of the prominent painters of the Norwich school, with whom he exhibited for some years. Sharp appears as a portrait-painter at the Royal Academy in 1801, but he attained his greatest success as a painter of small domestic scenes, usually of a humorous character. One of these, 'The Music Master,' exhibited at the British Institution in 1809, gained a premium of fifty guineas and was purchased by Mr. Thomas Hope. He obtained many commissions, and his pictures were usually quickly sold at the exhibitions. Many of them also were engraved, such as 'Sunday Morning' (R.A. 1820), 'The Sailor's Wedding' (R.A. 1828), 'The Black Draught,' and 'The Spoilt Child.' Sharp also executed for theatrical patrons several groups, containing portraits of the principal performers on the stage at that date, such as 'Queen Constance before the Tents of the English and Foreign Sovereigns,' painted in 1819; 'An Author reading his Drama to an Assemblage of the Performers in the Green Room of Drury Lane Theatre'; 'The Shakespeare Jubilee, with Portraits of the principal Covent Garden Performers,' &c. Sharp's works, despite a tendency to vulgarity, were very popular in his day. Sharp appears to have returned to London in 1820, and died at Boulogne in 1840. A lecture by him, delivered in 1820 to the Philosophical Society at Norwich, is printed in Elmes's 'Annals of the Fine Arts,' vols. iv. and v., as 'An Essay on Gesture.'

[Radgrave's Dict. of Artists; Graves's Dict. of Artists, 1760-1893; Annals of the Fine Arts, vols. iv. and v. passim.] L. C.

SHARP, PATRICK (d. 1615), Scottish theologian, was made master of Glasgow grammar school in 1574. While in this position he was brought much into contact with Andrew Melville (1545-1622) [q. v.], to whom he acknowledged many obligations (JAMES MELVILLE, Diary, ed. Pitcairn, p. 60). Soon after 1575 he was appointed one of a commission of classical scholars to draw up a new Latin grammar for use in the Scottish schools (Reg. of Scottish Privy Council, ed. Masson, ii. 475, v. 110, xxv). In 1585 James VI appointed him principal of the university of Glasgow. From this time he took an important part in the government and controversies of the Scottish church. He seems to have wished to preserve a position of neutrality between the two parties which divided the kirk, but he gradually inclined to the king's party. In 1586 he was placed on a commission charged by the general assembly to control the proceedings of the bishops (CALDERWOOD, History of the Kirk, ed. Thomson, iv. 570). In 1596 the general assembly appointed him and fifteen others to organise the church in opposition to the government. In consequence he was ordered by the privy council to return to Glasgow (Reg. of Scottish Privy Council, v. 333). But in the same year he took part in the reactionary general assembly at Perth, and in 1597 he formed part of the commission to whom were delegated the powers of the general assembly when that body was not in session, and whose appointment paved the way for the re-establishment of episcopacy (ib. p. 385; CALDERWOOD, v. 420, 609, 645, 701). In 1606 Sharp was summoned to Hampton Court, with seven other divines, to support the king's side in a debate with Andrew Melville and seven ultra-presbyterrians on the general questions at issue between king and kirk (MELVILLE, Diary, pp. 659, 684, 724, 754, 760). In the same year he was appointed constant moderator to the Glasgow presbytery in the absence of the bishop, and encountered such opposition that the privy council were obliged to order the presbytery to receive him under pain of rebellion. Yet in the following year he was rebuked for endeavouring to extend the judicial powers of the presbytery to the decision of criminal cases (Reg. of Privy Council, vii. 379). In 1609 Sharp took part in the Falkland conference, which was intended to render matters easy for the bishops at the general assembly (MELVILLE, Diary, p. 770). On 15 May 1610 he was appointed to the Scottish court of high commission, and held the office till 11 Aug. 1614 (ib. pp. 788, 797; Reg. of Privy Council, viii. 481). He died in May 1615, having been twice married: first, to Mary Fowles, widow of John Houlden of Balwill, on 1 Sept. 1598, by whom he had two sons, David and Christian, and two daughters; and, secondly, to Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Gale of Eastwood, by whom he had a son James.

Sharp was a distinguished scholar and the teacher of John Cameron (1579?-1625) [q. v.] But only one of his works survives, viz. 'Doctrinæ Christianæ brevis explicatio,' printed by Robert Waldegrave in Edinburgh in 1599.

[Scott's Fasti Ecclesie Scot. n. i. 66; Baillie's Letters, iii. 577; M'Ure's Glasgow, p. 224; M'Crie's Life of Andrew Melville, i. 77, 186, ii. 311; Monimenta Universitatis Glasguensis (Maitland Soc.), index.] E. I. C.

SHARP, RICHARD (1769-1835), known as 'Conversation Sharp,' the son of an English officer, was born in the British garrison at Newfoundland in 1769. He adopted a commercial life, and for many years was a partner in the West India house of Boddington, Sharp, & Phillips in Fish Street Hill, London. Afterwards he was a member of the firm of Richard Sharp & Co., hat manufacturers, at the same address, and in 1806 was described as of Mark Lane. In business he amassed a considerable fortune.

Through life Sharp took a keen interest in politics and in literature. In his early years he knew Johnson and Burke. His friendship with Rogers began in the spring of 1792, and in the following July they made a tour together in the south of England. They became the 'closest and most intimate friends.' He made the acquaintance of Sir James Mackintosh about 1788 at a meeting of the Society for obtaining Constitutional Information. Mackintosh said that Sharp was the best critic he had ever known, and discussed metaphysics with him for hours in the chambers of Rogers in the Temple. In the winter of 1791-2 Sharp co-operated with the leading members of the whig party in forming a society for obtaining a reform of parliament, which was known as 'Friends of the People.' He was a man of many clubs and societies, both literary and political. As a friend of Isaac Reed [q. v.], he belonged to the Unincreasable Club in Holborn, of which Reed was president, and he joined the Eumælean Club at the Blenheim tavern in Bond Street (NICHOLS, Lit. Anecdotes, ii. 638, 672). He was one of the original members of the Literary Society founded in 1806 (M. E. GRANT DUFF, Notes, 1897, ii. 289). He also attended, with Canning and Mackintosh, a debating society held at the Clifford Street coffee-house at the corner of Bond Street, and when the King of Clubs was instituted by 'Bobus' Smith about 1801 at the Crown and Anchor tavern in the Strand, three of the earliest members were Erskine, Curran, and Sharp (CUNNINGHAM, London, ed. Wheatley, i. 425, 480). He was elected F.S.A. on 19 April 1787, and F.R.S. on 12 June 1806.

From 1806 to 1812 Sharp sat in parliament as a consistent whig for the pocket borough of Castle Rising in Norfolk. At a by-election in March 1816 he was returned for the Irish constituency of Portarlington, and he was re-elected at the general election in 1818, but resigned early in 1819, and his friend David Ricardo [q. v.] took his place. He was returned for Litchester at the general election of 1826, but by an order of the House of Commons on 22 Feb. 1827 his name was erased from the list and the seat given to another. For a time he was a member of the finance committee, and a high compliment was paid to him by Henry Bankes [q. v.] for his services; but his name was not included in the renewed committee of June 1807 (Hansard, ix. 692-715). He was also a member of Horner's bullion committee (ib. xix. 1061). His chief speech was made on 21 March 1808 in introducing a motion condemning the expedition to Copenhagen (ib. x. 1185-1215), but this success was not followed up by later speeches. He was, however, on the testimony of Samuel Rogers, 'very active in the background.'

Sharp, when in London, lived in Park Lane, and in the country his 'cottage-home' was at Fredley Farm in Mickleham, near Dorking (THORNTON, Environs of London, ii. 490). At these houses he gathered around him the chief persons of the day, and he knew their characters so well that he could hit them off in a moment. His conversational talents gave him his nickname. Some notes of his talk are given in the 'Merivale Family Memorials,' pp. 210-11, and Henry Mill said in 1840, 'it was a fine thing for me to hear Conversation Sharp and my father [James Mill] converse' (C. Fox, Journals, i. 146-7). A list of the visitors at Fredley between 1797 and 1835 is given in 'Maria Drummond,' 1891, pp. 30-2. They included Horner (cf. Memoirs, ii. 355-6), Gratian, and Sydney Smith, who was so often there that he was dubbed 'the bishop of Mickleham.' Sharp was very friendly with Tom Moore, and was very kind to Macaulay at his entrance into life. Hallam introduces him as 'my late friend, Richard Sharp, whose good taste is well known' (Lit. Hist. Europe, pt. iv. chap. vii. n.) He was a friend of John Horne Tooke, and a familiar guest at Holland House. In the autumn of 1816 Sharp, while on the lake of Geneva, visited Byron, who preserved some of his anecdotes (MOORE, Byron, 1847 ed., pp. 205, 231, 323, 475).

Sharp often travelled on the continent, particularly in France, Switzerland, and Italy, and he was a frequent visitor to the English lakes, where he made the acquaintance of their poets. Wordsworth used to say that Sharp knew Italy better than any one he ever met (KNIGHT, Life of Wordsworth, iii. 260-1). In the spring of 1804 he entertained Coleridge very generously in London. His health began to decline about 1832; he spent the winter of 1834-5 at Torquay. He died unmarried at Dorchester, while on the journey to London, on 30 March 1835. His ward and adopted child, Maria Kinnaird, married Thomas Drummond (1797-1840) [q. v.]. She inherited the bulk of Sharp's property, including the estate at Fredley and a house at Hyde Park Gardens, in which was the Reynolds portrait of Dr. Johnson, that had been bought at the Thrale sale in 1816. Mrs. Drummond died at Fredley on 16 Jan. 1891.

In 1828 Sharp issued to his friends an anonymous volume of 'Epistles in Verse,' which were composed abroad between 1816 and 1823. They were reproduced, with the addition of an 'Epistle to Lord Holland, Windermere, 1829,' in his volume of 'Letters and Essays in Prose and Verse' (anon.), 1834; 2nd ed. by Richard Sharp, 1834; 3rd ed., 1834. These were noticed in the 'Quarterly Review,' li. 285-304, and were pronounced remarkable 'for wisdom, wit, knowledge of the world, and sound criticism.' He had contributed in 1784 a preface to the 'Essay towards an English Grammar,' by his old schoolmaster, John Fell (1735-1797) [q. v.], and a paper by him, 'On the Nature and Utility of Eloquence,' was read before the Literary and Philosophical Society of Manchester on 2 Nov. 1787, and printed in its 'Memoirs' (iii. 307-29). A 'Letter to the Public Meeting of the Friends to the Repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts from a Lay Dissenter, 1790,' is attributed to him (HARRIS and LAING, Dict. of Anon. Lit. ii. 1403-4).

Sharp at one time contemplated writing a history of the establishment of American independence, a scheme which was encouraged by his intimate friend, John Adams, afterwards president of the United States. Sharp assisted in the 'Memoirs of Mackintosh.' Numerous letters to him are in that work, i. 128 et seq.; Parr's 'Works,' vii. 322-4; Knight's 'Wordsworth,' i. 377-8, ii. 9-118, iii. 61-2, 77; and Mr. Clayden's volumes on Samuel Rogers.

[Gent. Mag. 1835 ii. 96-7; (Marsh) Clubs of London, ii. 161-2; Timbs's Clubs, i. 165-6, 169, Clayden's Early Life of Rogers, p. 253 to end; Clayden's Rogers and Contemporaries, passim; Wilson's House of Commons, 1808, p. 133; Dyce's Table Talk of Rogers, pp. 18, 132-3, 197, Notes and Queries, 7th ser. ix. 419, 613; Paul's Maria Drummond, 1891; Times, 17 Jan. 1891, p. 10; Bright's Dorking, pp. 137-44; Lady Holland's Sydney Smith, i. 129, ii. 364-6; Horner's Memoirs, i. 133-5, 253-4; Walpole's Lord John Russell, i. 229-20; Cowper's Works, ed. Bruce, i. p. cvii; Memoirs of Mackintosh, i. pp. iv. 169, 433.] W. P. C.

SHARP, SAMUEL (1700?-1778), surgeon, son of Henry Sharp of the island of Jamaica, was born about 1700. He was bound apprentice for seven years to William Cheselden [q. v.], the great surgeon at St. Thomas's Hospital, on 2 March 1724. He paid 300*l.* when his indentures were signed, the money being found by Elizabeth Sale, a widow living at Hertford. Sharp appears to have spent a part of his apprenticeship in France, where he made the acquaintance of Voltaire, and acquired that knowledge of French surgery which afterwards stood him in good stead. He was admitted a freeman of the Barber-Surgeons' Company on 7 March 1731, obtained his diploma on 4 April 1732, and on 6 June, when he was living in Ingram Court, Fenchurch Street, he 'was admitted into the livery and clothing of the Company.' He was elected surgeon to Guy's Hospital on 9 Aug. 1733, the year in which Cheselden published his 'Osteographia.' Sharp is said to have assisted his former master in the preparation of this great work, and Cheselden introduced a portrait of Belchier and Sharp into the frontispiece. Sharp rapidly acquired an extensive practice. In 1746 want of leisure, probably combined with frequent attacks of asthma, led him to resign to William Hunter the 'course of anatomical lectures, to which were added the operations of surgery, with the application of bandages.' He had been in the habit of delivering the lectures in Covent Garden on winter afternoons to a society of navy surgeons. Out of these lectures grew Hunter's Great Windmill Street school of medicine, which laid the foundations of modern medical teaching. Sharp paid a second visit to Paris in 1749, and was elected a member of the Paris Royal Society, having been made a fellow of the Royal Society of London on 13 April 1749. The direct outcome of this journey was 'A Critical Enquiry into the Present State of Surgery,' published in 1754, a work which gives an interesting account of the contemporary practice of surgery, especially in French schools.

Sharp resigned his appointment at Guy's Hospital on 28 Sept. 1757 on the ground of ill-health; but he continued to practise until 1765, when he set out on a winter tour through Italy. The results were published in his plain-speaking 'Letters from Italy,' which appeared in August 1766. Dr. Johnson thought 'there was a great deal of matter in them.' The publication of a second edition in 1767 called forth Baretti's 'Account of the Manners and Customs of Italy,' an acrid criticism of Sharp's views. It was answered by Sharp in 'A View of the Customs, Manners, Drama, &c., of Italy, as they are described in the "Frustra Litteraria,"' London, 8vo, 1768. Sharp died on 24 March 1778.

'Sharp,' says Sir James Paget, 'was a thoroughly informed surgeon, well read, observant, judicious, a lover of simplicity, wisely doubtful. I think, too, he must have been an eminently safe man, who might be relied on for knowing or doing whatever, in his time, could be known or done for the good of his patients. In this view, I believe he was as good a surgeon as Hunter; but there is nothing in his books that can justly be called pathology, nor any sign of a really scientific method of study. They contain the practice, not the principles, of surgery.' Sharp's work attracted much notice upon the continent, and he is interesting as the immediate link connecting the old with modern surgery. Cheselden was his master; Hunter, if not actually his pupil, learnt from him by tradition. Among other improvements in surgical instruments introduced by Sharp, he is said to have been the first to suggest that the barrel of a trephine should be conical.

Besides the 'Letters from Italy,' Sharp published: 1. 'A Treatise on the Operations of Surgery,' London, 1739; 2nd edit. 1739; 3rd edit. 1740; 4th edit. 1743; 6th edit. 1751; 8th edit. 1761; 10th edit. 1782; French translation by A. F. Jault, Paris, 1741. 2. 'A Critical Enquiry into the Present State of Surgery,' London, 8vo, 1750; 2nd edit. 1750; 3rd edit. 1754; 4th edit. 1761; translated into French 1751, into Spanish 1753, into German 1756, and Italian 1774. This book, written clearly and in good English, contains thirteen short chapters upon hernia, lithotomy, amputations, concussion of the brain, tumours of the gall-bladder, extirpation of the tonsils, hydrocele, and a few other matters. To the 'Philosophical Transactions' Sharp contributed two papers in 1753 on 'A New Method of Opening the Cornea in order to Extract the Crystalline Humour,' and in 1754 a paper 'On the Styptic Powers of Agaric.'

[The manuscript records at the Barber-Surgeons' Hall, by the kind permission of the master, Sidney Young, esq., F.S.A.; Wilks and Bettany's Biographical Dictionary of Guy's Hospital; Boswell's Life of Johnson, ed. G. B. Hill; additional facts kindly given to the author by Dr. Wilks, F.R.S.; Paget's Hunterian Oration, 1877; Hutchinson's Address in Surgery in the British Medical Journal, 1895, ii. 278.] D'A. P.

SHARP, SAMUEL (1814-1882), geologist and antiquary, son of Stephen Sharp and Anna Maria Bloor of Uppingham, was born on 18 July 1814 at Romsey in Hampshire. While still young he lost his father; his mother then removed to Stamford in Lincolnshire, and married the proprietor and editor of the 'Stamford Mercury.' Sharp, who for a considerable time aided his stepfather in conducting this newspaper, soon began to study geology. In 1857 he went to live near Northampton, where he continued his scientific work and increased his collection of fossils. He published two very valuable papers on the Northamptonshire oolites in the 'Quarterly Journal of the Geological Society' (xxvi. 354, xxix. 225), besides a few of minor interest, and a useful textbook, 'Rudiments of Geology' (1875), a second and enlarged edition being published in the following year. He was also a diligent student of local antiquities, formed a valuable collection of the coins minted at Stamford, and described them in the 'Journal of the Numismatic Society.' He was a fellow of that society, of the Society of Antiquaries, and from 1862 of the Geological Society. He married, in 1846, Caroline Ann Weldon, and died without issue on 28 Jan.

1882, at Great Harrowden Hall, near Wellingborough, where the later years of his life were spent.

[Obituary Notices, Geol. Mag. 1882, p. 144, and Quart. Journ. of the Geol. Soc. xxxviii.,
Proc. p. 63, information from Prof. J. W. Judd.]
T. G. B.

SHARP, THOMAS, D.D. (1693-1768), biographer and theological writer, younger son of John Sharp [q. v.], archbishop of York, was born on 12 Dec. 1693. At the age of fifteen he was admitted of Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated
B.A. in 1712, M.A. in 1716, and was elected to a fellowship. He became chaplain to Archbishop Dawes; prebendary of South-well; a member of the Gentlemen's Society at Spalding; prebendary of Wistow in the church of York on 29 April 1719; rector of Rothbury, Northumberland, and archdeacon of Northumberland on 27 Feb. 1722-3 (HUTCHINSON, Durham, ii. 235). He was created D.D. at Cambridge in 1729. On 1 Dec. 1732 he was installed in the tenth prebend of the cathedral at Durham, and in 1755 he succeeded Dr. Mangey as official to the dean and chapter of that cathedral. He died at Durham on 16 March 1758, and was buried at the west end of the cathedral in the chapel called the Galilee. Portraits of Sharp are prefixed to his collected 'Works,' 1763, and his life of his father, 1825 (cf. BROMLEY).

He married, on 19 June 1722, Judith, daughter of Sir George Wheler [q. v.] (she died on 2 July 1757), and had fourteen children. His eldest son, John Sharp, D.D., was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, became a prebendary of Durham, archdeacon of Northumberland, vicar of Hartborne, perpetual curate of Bamburgh, and senior trustee of the estates of Nathaniel, lord Crewe, bishop of Durham, whose charities he was indefatigable in promoting; and died on 28 April 1792. His ninth son was Granville Sharp [q. v.], and another son, William, was a surgeon at Fulham.

His chief works are: 1. 'A Vindication of Bishop Taylor from the injurious misrepresentation of him by the Author of the Letter to the Clergy of the Church of England in the county of Northumberland,' 1733.
2. 'An Enquiry about the Lawfulness of Eating Blood. Occasion'd by Revelation examind with Candour. . . . By a Preben-dary of York,' London, 1733, 8vo. 3. 'A Defence of the Enquiry about the Lawfulness of Eating Blood,' London, 1734, 8vo.
4. 'Opinion on a Proposal for instituting a Protestant Convent,' 1737; printed in his 'Life' of Archbishop Sharp, ii. 281. 5. 'Two Dissertations concerning the Etymology and

Scripture-Meaning of the Hebrew words Elohim and Berith. Occasioned by some Notions lately advanced [by J. Hutchinson and A. S. Catcott] in relation to them,' London, 1761, 8vo. This elicited replies from J. Bate and B. Holloway, and these two writers were answered by G. Kalmár, who defended Sharp. The latter issued a 'review and defence' of the dissertations (pt. i. 1754, pt. ii. and iii. 1755). 6. 'The Rubric in the Book of Common Prayer and the Canons of the Church of England, so far as they relate to the Parochial Clergy, considered,' London, 1763, 8vo; 1787, 8vo; Oxford, 1834 and 1853, 8vo. 7. 'Discourses touching the antiquity of the Hebrew Tongue and Character,' London, 1755, 8vo. 8. 'Mr. Hutchinson's Exposition of Cherubim, and his Hypothesis concerning them examined,' London, 1755. W. Hodges published a reply.
9. 'Sermons on several occasions,' 1763,
8vo. 10. 'Discourses on Preaching; or, directions towards attaining the best manner of discharging the duties of the Pulpit,' 3rd edit. London, 1787, 8vo. 11. 'The Life of John Sharp, D.D., Lord Archbishop of York.
. . . Edited by Thomas Newcome, M.A.,' 2 vols., London, 1825, 8vo. A collected edition of Sharp's 'Works' appeared, with a portrait prefixed, in 1763; his correspondence with Mrs. Catherine Cockburn on moral virtue and moral obligation was published in 1743, and he left in manuscript 'Catalogus Episcoporum, Priorum, Decanorum, Canonicorum Ecclesiæ Dunelmensis. Cui præmittitur Series Episcoporum Lindisfarnen-sium. Subjiciuntur Catalogi Archidiacon-orum Dunelmensis et Northumbriæ, et Cancellariorum Temporalium et Spiritualium Dunelmensis,' and 'An Account of Hexham' (NICHOLS, Lit. Anecd. i. 437, viii. 373).

[Addit. MS. 5880 f. 194; Bromley's Cat. of Engraved Portraits, p. 280; Byrom's Journal, i.
206, 361, 368, 399, 422, 630; Mrs. Catherine Cockburn's Life prefixed to her Works, p. xlv.
vol. ii. pp. 311, 312, 353; Collinson's Somerset,
iii. 563; Cooke's Preacher's Assistant, ii. 300; Hutchinson's Durham, ii. 211; Jones's Life of Bishop Horne, pp. 81 seq.; Prince Hoare's Me-moires of Granville Sharp, 1820; Wragham's
Zouch, ii. 206; Letters of Eminent Literary Men (Camden Soc.); Lowndes's Bibl. Man. (Bohn); Nichols's Illustr. of Lit. iv. 352; Nichols's Lit.
Anecd. i. 437, vi. 111, x. 674; Stukeley's Caracsius, pp. 96, 116.] T. C.

SHARP, THOMAS (1770-1841), antiquary, only son of Thomas Sharp of Coventry, latter, was born on 7 Nov. 1770, in a house in Smithford Street, Coventry, distinguished by the effigy of 'Peeping Tom.'
He was educated at the free grammar school, and on his father's death, in 1784, carried on the business.

From youth Sharp devoted himself to the study of local antiquities. About 1798 Sharp, with two friends, employed a drawing-master to take views of all the buildings of interest in the county, which they caused to be engraved and inserted in their copies of Dugdale's 'Warwickshire.' In 1820 Sharp procured rubbings of all the brasses in the county for insertion in the same work. In 1804 he retired from the retail trade, and devoted his additional leisure to antiquarian research. In 1824 appeared his 'Guides to Coventry,' and in 1825 he published his chief work, 'A Dissertation on the Pageants, or Dramatic Mysteries, anciently performed at Coventry by the Trading Companies of that City,' a treatise of great interest from its bearing on this early history of the stage. The research which it displayed elicited the praise of Sir Walter Scott.

In 1834 Sharp relinquished his business altogether and removed to Leamington, where he was in constant communication with fellow antiquaries, such as Palgrave, Dawson Turner, Douce, William Salt, and John Britton. In his later years he was an intimate friend and correspondent of William Hamper [q. v.], for whom he acted as executor. In 1837 he took a principal part in founding the Coventry and Warwick hospital. He died on 12 Aug. 1841 at Leamington, and was interred at St. Michael's burying-ground, Coventry. He married, in 1804, Charlotte Turland of Barnwell, Cambridgeshire, and had nine children, of whom seven survived him.

At the time of his death Sharp was engaged on a history of Coventry, which appeared posthumously under the title of 'A Concise History of Coventry.' A collection of Sharp's papers on the Coventry churches, illustrating the history of the city, was published in 1871, as 'Coventry Antiquities,' with a memoir by William George Fretton. Prefixed is a portrait of Sharp etched by Mrs. Dawson Turner, after a drawing made by J. S. Cotman in 1823.

Apart from his topographical collections relating to Warwickshire (the majority of which, in manuscript form, were purchased in 1834 by William Staunton of Longbridge House, near Warwick), Sharp was an assiduous collector of coins, and he was an authority on provincial coins and tokens. He drew up a valuable 'Catalogue of Provincial Copper Coins, Tokens, Tickets, and Medalets' of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, from the collection of Sir George Chetwynd at Graddon Hall; of this sixty copies were printed in quarto in 1834. One of Sharp's coins, a gold half-florin of Edward III, of which only two specimens are known, is now in the British Museum.

Sharp also published: 1. 'The Pageant of the Company of Sheremen and Tailors in Coventry,' 1817, 4to. 2. 'An Account of the Fraternity of the Gray Friars in Coventry,' 1818, 4to. 3. 'History of Bablake Church, Coventry,' 1818, 4to. 4. 'Illustrations of the History of the Church of the Holy Trinity, Coventry,' 1818, 4to. 5. 'Illustrations of the History of St. Michael's Church, Coventry,' 1818, 4to. 6. 'Kenilworth Illustrated,' 1821, 4to. 7. 'Ancient Mysteries and Moralities,' edited from the Digby MSS., 1835, 4to. 8. 'An Epitome of the County of Warwickshire,' London, 1835, 4to.

[Memoir in Coventry Antiquities, 1871; Colville's Warwickshire Worthies, p. 676; Gent. Mag. 1800 ii. 945, 1841 ii. 436; Notes and Queries, 5th ser. vi. 466.] E. I. C.

SHARP, WILLIAM (1749-1824), engraver, son of a gunmaker residing in Haydon Yard, Minorics, London, was born on 29 Jan. 1749. His father apprenticed him to Barak Longmate [q. v.], an engraver and genealogist. Shortly after the expiry of his indentures he married a Frenchwoman, and opened a shop as a writing engraver in Bartholomew Lane. His first noteworthy production was an engraving of Hector, the old lion at the Tower, on a small quarto plate, which he exposed for sale in his shop window. About 1782 he sold his shop and removed to Vauxhall, where he devoted himself to the superior branches of his art. His merit showed itself in some plates from the designs of Stothard, executed for the 'Novelist's Magazine.' He also completed the plate of West's 'Landing of Charles II,' which Woollett had left unfinished at his death, and engraved some of the illustrations for 'Captain Cook's Voyages' and Benwell's 'Children in the Wood.' His circumstances improving, he left Vauxhall and finally settled at Chiswick, where he spent the latter part of his life. Among his best works are—after Guido, 'The Doctors of the Church disputing,' and 'Ecce Homo;' after West, 'King Lear in the Storm' and 'The Witch of Endor;' after Trumbull, 'The Sortie from Gibraltar;' after Sir Joshua Reynolds, the portrait of John Hunter and 'The Holy Family.' Sharp's style of engraving is masterly and entirely original; the half-tints of his best works rich and full; the play of his lines marked by taste and genius; the colour and character of the master excellently rendered. His reputation as an engraver was very great on the continent, and he was elected honorary member of the Imperial Academy at Vienna and of the Royal Academy at Munich.

In his younger days Sharp was a republican and a friend of Thomas Paine and Horne Tooke. He became a member of the Society for Constitutional Information, and in consequence was involved in the proceedings taken against Horne Tooke. He was examined on treasonable charges before the privy council, but dismissed without punishment as a harmless enthusiast. After becoming a convert to the views of Mesmer and Swedenborg, the religious opinions of Jacob Bryan and Richard Brothers engaged his attention, and he engraved Brothers as 'Prince of the Hebrews,' with rays of light descending on his head. When Brothers was confined at Islington as a lunatic, Sharp became a staunch adherent of Joanna Southcott, whom he brought from Exeter to London and maintained at his own expense for a considerable time. He was the last of her followers to admit the reality of her death, and he never lost faith in her divine mission nor expectation of her reappearance. Sharp died at Chiswick on 25 July 1824, and was buried in the parish churchyard. His portrait was painted by George Francis Joseph, and engraved by himself. Another portrait, engraved by Thomson, is prefixed to his memoir in the 'European Magazine.'

Sharp was the author of 'An Answer to the World for putting in print a book called Copies and Parts of Copies of Letters and Communications written from Joanna Southcote,' London, 1806, 8vo. There is a large collection of his engravings in the British Museum.

A three-quarter length portrait, in oil, by James Lonsdale [q. v.], is in the National Portrait Gallery, London.

[Baker's Life of Sharp, 1875; European Mag. 1824, ii. 191, 357; Annual Biogr. and Obituary, 1825, p. 216; Gent. Mag. 1824, ii. 409; Redgrave's Dict. of Artists, Bryan's Dict. of Painters and Engravers; Dodd's Memoirs of English Engravers, Brit. Mus. Add. MS. 33404, f. 201.]

E. I. G.

SHARP, WILLIAM (1805-1896), physician, third son and fifth child of Richard Sharp, merchant, and Mary Turton, his wife, was born at Armley, near Leeds, on 21 Jan. 1805. His family had lived in that neighbourhood and at Horton, near Bradford, for several generations. One member of it was John Sharp [q. v.], the archbishop of York; another was Abraham Sharp [q. v.], the astronomer and mathematician. William Sharp was educated at Wakefield grammar school from 1813 to 1816, under the supervision of his uncle, Samuel Sharp, vicar of the parish, and he was afterwards sent to Westminster school, where he remained from 1817 to 1820. He was articled in 1821 to his uncle, William Sharp, a leading surgeon at Bradford, and he subsequently served a part of his apprenticeship to his uncle's cousin, the second William Hay of Leeds. He went to London on the completion of his indentures to attend the lectures and the practice at the united borough hospital. In 1826 he obtained the license of the Society of Apothecaries, and in 1827 he was admitted a member of the College of Surgeons of England. He proceeded to Paris, as was then the fashion for the better class of newly qualified medical men. After a year he returned to Bradford to assist his uncle, the surgeon, to whose practice he succeeded in 1833. He was elected a surgeon to the Bradford infirmary in 1829, and became its senior surgeon in 1837; at the same time he conducted for many years the largest general practice in the West Riding of Yorkshire.

A natural bent for science, fostered by his education at the Sorbonne, led him to establish the Bradford Philosophical Society, of which he was the first president. In 1839 he read an important paper at the Birmingham meeting of the British Association, in which he advocated the formation of local museums, each collection being limited to objects of interest belonging to the town in which it was formed. This paper led to his election as fellow of the Royal Society on 7 May 1840.

He left Bradford in 1843 and lived at Hull for the succeeding four years, practising his profession, and giving two winter courses of lectures on chemistry at the Hull and East Riding school of medicine. After spending some time in travel, he removed to Rugby, so that his sons might attend the school there. Dr. Tait was then headmaster. At Rugby Sharp's energy in the promotion of science led to the establishment of science-teaching as an integral part of the curriculum of the Rugby school, and Sharp was appointed in 1849 its 'reader in natural philosophy.' He resigned the post in 1850, to devote himself more exclusively to medical investigations. At the suggestion of his friend, Dr. Ramsbotham of Leeds, he studied homoeopathy, and two years later adopted the methods of homoeopaths. He acted in 1873 as president of the British homoeopathic congress at Leamington, but further experimental researches carried him to a point of view accepted by few of Hahneman's disciples. In his discovery at last of the opposite actions of large and small doses of the same drug, he believed that he had taken the first steps towards a more scientific basis for therapeutics; and he also saw in it a principle of reconciliation between two theories of medicine hitherto regarded as antagonistic. The progress of pharmacology, of experimental physiology, and of bacteriology has shown that some of the facts upon which he based his theory are capable of an explanation widely different from his own.

In 1856 the degree of M.D. was conferred upon him by the archbishop of Canterbury. He retired from practice in 1877, but continued his medical researches for some years longer. He died while on a visit to Llandudno, 10 April 1896. His body lies in the graveyard of Llanrhos. A portrait, painted in 1840 by Thomas Richmond, is now in the possession of Mrs. Sharp at Horton House, Rugby. Sharp married, on 10 March 1836, Emma, sixth daughter of John Scott, vicar of St. Mary's, Hull [see under SCOTT, THOMAS, 1747-1821].

Sharp's claim to recognition rests on his practical suggestions for encouraging the study of natural science. It is owing to his initiative that every public school in England now has its science teacher, and every town its local museum. The value of his medical researches remains for future estimate. Allowing himself to no school and wedding himself to no theory, his sole object in life appears to have been to advance physic along the lines of therapeutics.

He published: 1. 'Practical Observations on Injuries of the Head,' 8vo, London, 1841. 2. 'Therapeutics founded upon Organopathy and Antipraxy,' London, 8vo, 1886. He also wrote sixty tracts on homœopathy and the action of drugs in varying doses, published at different times between 1851 and 1892. The first twenty-six were collected in 1874 in a volume entitled 'Essays on Medicine, being an Investigation of Homœopathy and other Medical Systems.'

[Men and Women of the Time, 13th edit. p. 817; additional information kindly given by Miss Sharp, his daughter.] D.A.P.

SHARPE. [See also SHARP.]

SHARPE, BARTHOLOMEW (fl. 1679-1682), buccaneer, was, apparently, one of the party of buccaneers, French and English, which in 1679 captured and sacked Porto Bello on the Spanish main. He was certainly with the Englishmen who, after separating from the French, assembled at Golden Island, to the east of the Sumballas. They had proposed to cross the isthmus and sack Panama, but their numbers, through the defection of the French, being too few, they resolved to cross over, descend the river Santa Maria, take the town of Santa Maria on the way, cruise in the Bay of Panama, and afterwards on the coast of Peru. At Santa Maria the booty was small. On reaching the sea they found a barque of thirty tons, which they seized, and, putting Sharpe in command, sent her to water and provision at the Pearl Islands, while the rest of the party, under the command of one Coxon, went in the canoes towards Panama. A quarrel soon split this party into two; Coxon, with seventy men, recrossed the isthmus, while one Richard Sawkins, taking command of the rest of the men, demanded a ransom from the town of Panama.

Soon afterwards Sharpe rejoined Sawkins, and on 22 May 1680 they landed to attack Pueblo Nuevo, where Sawkins, while leading on his men, was shot dead. On this the buccaneers retired to the island of Quibo, and, after a fresh dispute, Sharpe was elected to the command, about a hundred men seceding and returning across the isthmus to the West Indies. In June Sharpe went south, meaning to attack Guayaquil; but, finding that impracticable, he went to the Isle of Plate, where the buccaneers killed and salted down a great number of goats. Going along the coast, making sundry prizes as they went, on 20 Oct. they were off Arica. The whole country awaited them under arms; they could not venture to land, and bore away for Islay, being very short of water, the daily allowance being reduced to half a pint. It is said that a pint was sold on board for twenty dollars. At Islay they filled up with water; and as the Spaniards refused to ransom the town, they burnt it. They then went on to the southward, and on 3 Dec. landed and occupied the town of Serena. The Spaniards agreed to ransom the town for ninety-five thousand dollars; but instead of paying made an ingenious attempt to burn the ship. With some difficulty the fire was put out, and the buccaneers departed with less than a tenth of what they had demanded. At Juan Fernandez, Sharpe, who had got together about 1,000*l.* as his share of the booty, wished to go back to the West Indies through the Straits of Magellan; but the majority, who by gambling had lost everything, were determined to stay, and deposed Sharpe from the command, electing in his room one John Watling, 'an old privateer and esteemed a stout seaman.' At Arica, however, on 30 Jan. 1680-1, they sustained a disastrous repulse, Watling being killed, some twenty-eight others killed or prisoners—who met with scant mercy—and eighteen wounded. Sharpe was now reinstated in the command, he 'being esteemed a safer leader than any other.' The general voice was to return to the West Indies across the isthmus. At the Isle of Plate, however, in the middle of April, things looked brighter, and they resolved to cruise for some time longer. This led to a further secession, and the dissenting party, including William Dampier [q. v.] and Lionel Wafer [q. v.], returned to the West Indies by the isthmus, while Sharpe went for a cruise to the northward, and captured a Spanish ship named the Rosario, having on board a large quantity of silver in pigs, to the value of about 150,000*l*. At the time the silver was mistaken for tin, and Sharps took only one pig on board. Most of this was cast into bullets; it was only when the small residue was afterwards disposed of in the West Indies, that the buccaneers learnt what a prize had escaped them. They found also in the Rosario 'a great book of sea charts and maps' of the South Sea and the coasts of Spanish America, which was afterwards presented to the king. The volume now in the British Museum (Sloane MS. 44), drawn by William Hack, is presumably a copy of this.

On 16 Aug. Sharpe and his followers resolved to return to the West Indies. Making their way to the southward, they passed round Cape Horn in November, and reached Barbados on 28 Jan. 1681-2. Learning, however, that the Richmond frigate was there, and fearing that they might be seized as pirates, they went to Antigua, but the governor would not allow them into the harbour. At Nevis the authorities were more complacent, and there the party broke up, the ship being assigned to some of the men who had lost all their money in gaming. On his return to England, Sharpe was arrested at the instance of the Spanish ambassador, and tried for piracy; but in the absence of legal evidence was acquitted. His journals and 'waggoners,' carefully written and drawn (Sloane MSS. 44, 46a and b, and 47), suggest that he was permitted to live in peace and comfort.

[Ringrose's Dangerous Voyage and Bold Attempts of Captain Bartholomew Sharp and others, in History of the Buccaneers, vol. ii.; Dampier's Voyages, vol. i.; Wafer's New Voyage; Burney's Voyages and Discoveries in the South Sea, iv. 91-124.] J. K. L.

SHARPE, CHARLES KIRKPATRICK (1781?-1851), antiquary and artist, was the second son of Charles Sharps of Hoddam, Dumfriesshire, by Eleonora, youngest daughter of John Renton of Lamerton. His mother was granddaughter of Susanna, countess of Eglinton, third wife of the ninth earl, Alexander Montgomerie [q. v.]. He was born about 1781. The father, Charles Sharpe, was the son of William Kirkpatrick of Ailsland (brother of Sir Thomas Kirkpatrick, second baronet of Closeburn), who changed his name to Sharpe on inheriting the estate of Hoddam from his uncle, Matthew Sharpe. To Charles Sharps, Burns, under the signature 'Johnny Faa,' addressed a curious letter, humorously claiming to belong to 'the same family,' not on the ground of relationship, but on the score of being 'a fiddler and a poet;' and enclosing some stanzas to a tune of which he said 'a brither catgut' gave him 'the other day.' Sharpe's grand-uncle, Charles Sharpe, a Jacobite who fought at Preston, also possessed literary tastes, and was a correspondent of David Hume. Further, the family claimed kinship with the noted Grierson of Lag. Thus, while Sharpe could claim an ancestry of some distinction, intellectual and other, he was also from his infancy nourished on Jacobite story and tradition; and this phase of Scottish sentiment occupied most of his interest, and mainly directed the bent of his artistic studies and his antiquarian research.

With the view of taking episcopal orders, Sharps entered Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. 17 June 1802, and M.A. 28 June 1806. But, although he made several friendships, the social life and special studies of the university were uncongenial to him. In truth his attitude towards his fellows was always more or less repellent; he was unsympathetic and depreciatory, and from first to last he was accustomed to emphasise and magnify the frailties of his acquaintances, and all but ignore their good points. At the university he devoted himself chiefly to antiquarian research and to practice with his pencil, making some reputation by his sketches of heads. Either before or soon after leaving the university he gave up all thoughts of entering the church, and finally, about his thirtieth year, he took up his residence in Edinburgh, where, although he maintained friendly relations with many distinguished persons, including especially clever and sprightly aristocratic ladies, and was a welcome guest in many country houses, he lived mainly the life of a literary recluse. With advancing years his peculiarities became more pronounced, and they were emphasised by the fact that till the close of his life he retained the style of dress which was in fashion at the period of his early manhood.

The appearance of the first volume of Scott's 'Border Minstrelsy,' in 1802 naturally aroused Sharpe's special enthusiasm. Though unacquainted with Scott, he sent him a warm letter of congratulation, which led to a lifelong friendship; and to the second volume of the 'Minstrelsy' he contributed two ballads of his own. In 1807 he also published at Oxford 'Metrical Legends and other Poems;' but, as Scott remarks, 'as a poet he has not a strong touch.' As an artist he showed much greater talent. Scott affirmed 'that had he made drawing a resource it might have raised him a large income;' but he can scarcely be reckoned more than a skilful amateur. In drawing, his main forte was apparently satirical, or rather perhaps grotesque, caricature. His efforts were described by Scott as the 'most fanciful and droll imaginable, a mixture between Hogarth and some of those foreign masters who painted temptations of St. Anthony and other grotesque subjects.' Sharpe's frontispieces and other illustrations in the Bannatyne Club and similar antiquarian publications evince much antiquarian knowledge. He possessed an unrivalled collection of Scottish curios and antiques; and Sir Walter was frequently and much indebted to his proficiency in this and kindred branches of antiquarian lore. He was moreover specially learned in Scottish genealogy, especially in its scandalous aspect, having carefully gleaned and preserved every fact or anecdote of this character that he could discover in books, manuscripts, or tradition.

In 1817 Sharpe edited Kirkton's 'Secret and True History of the Church of Scotland from the Restoration to the Year 1678, with an Account of the Murder of Archbishop Sharpe, by James Russell, an Actor therein.' To the volume he supplied a large number of notes which, if they breathe rather the spirit of the partisan than the conscientious historian, display much learning. This was followed in 1820 by an edition of Law's 'Memorials; or the considerable Things that fell out within the Island of Great Britain from 1638 to 1684,' containing much curious information regarding witchcraft and kindred subjects. In 1823 he published his 'Ballad Book,' which in 1830 was re-edited by David Laing, with some additions from Sharpe's manuscripts; the majority of the added ballads were of more or less questionable authenticity. Sharpe, though he dabbled a good deal in this species of literature, and collected printed chaps and broadsides, as well as manuscripts from 'recitation,' only possessed a fragmentary knowledge of the subject. To Laing's edition of Stenhouse's notes to Johnson's 'Musical Museum,' 1853, he made some contributions. In 1827 he edited 'A Part of the Life of Lady Margaret Cunningham, daughter of the Earl of Glencairn, that she had with her first Husband, the Earl of Elandale;' in 1829 (for the Bannatyne Club), 'The Letters of Archibald, Earl of Argyll;' and in 1837, 'Surgundo, or the Valiant Christian,' a romanist ode of triumph for the victory of Glanrinnies in 1594; and the same year, 'Mimues and Songs of Thomas, sixth Earl of Kellie.' In 1838 he published a volume of etchings, under the title 'Portraits of an Amateur,' and his 'Etchings, with Photographs from Original Drawings, Poetical and Prose Fragments,' appeared posthumously at Edinburgh in 1869. The 'Letters to and from C. K. Sharpe,' edited by Alexander Allardyce, 1888, tend to corroborate the estimate of Scott, that 'Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe, with his oddities, tastes, satire, and high aristocratic feelings, resembles Horace Walpole—perhaps in his person, perhaps in a general way.' Sharpe died unmarried, 17 March 1851. Two portraits, by John Irvine and Thomas Fraser respectively, are in the National Portrait Gallery, Edinburgh; the latter was engraved in mezzotint by Thomas Dick in 1851.

[Gent. Mag. 1851, i. 557; Memoir prefixed to Sharpe's Etchings, 1869; Memoir by Rev. W. K. R. Bedford, prefixed to Letters, 1888; Lockhart's Life of Scott; Scott's Journal.]

T. F. H.

SHARPE, DANIEL (1800-1856), geologist, son of Sutton Sharpe (1756-1806), brewer, by his second wife, Maria, sister of the poet, Samuel Rogers [q.v.] Samuel Sharpe [q.v.] was an elder brother. Daniel was born at Nottingham Place, Marylebone, 6 April 1806. His mother died 22 April, and his father 26 Sept. 1806. But a half-sister took the place of a parent to the child, as well as to a sister and four brothers, and his early days were spent with her at Stoke Newington. He was educated, first there, then at Mr. Cogan's school, Walthamstow. At the age of sixteen he was placed with a Portuguese merchant named Van Zeller, and about 1830 lived for a year in Portugal. Then he became partner with his elder brother, Henry Sharpe, in the same line of business, and again resided in Portugal from 1835 to 1838. Fond of natural history as a boy, he devoted himself, on joining the Geological Society in 1827, to that science. In 1832, 1839, 1848, and 1849 he read papers to this society on the geology of Portugal, which were for a considerable time almost the only authorities on that subject. The second of these contains some important remarks on the way in which the effect of an earthquake shock is modified by the constitution of the strata; and the third notices some remarkable coal-beds at Vallongo.

After his return to England in 1838, he took a special interest in palæozoic geology, reading four papers between 1842 and 1844—the first dealing with the south of Westmoreland; the second with the Bala limestone, in which he affirmed its identity with the Caradoc of Sir Roderick Impey Murchison [q. v.]; the third on the silurian rocks of south Westmoreland and north Lancashire; and the fourth on the geology of North Wales (Geol. Soc. Proc. iii. 602, iv. 10, 23, Journ. i. 147). Afterwards he wrote an important paper on the palæozoic fossils of North America collected by Sir Charles Lyell [q. v.] His work in Wales and the Lake District turned his attention to the subject of slaty cleavage, and he showed, in two important papers (Quart. Journ. Geol. Soc. iii. 74, v. 111), that this structure must be a result of pressure. He returned to the subject in 1852 (Phil. Trans. 1852, p. 445), when he discussed cleavage and foliation in southern Scotland; and in 1855, after visiting the Alps (Quart. Journ. Geol. Soc. xi. 11), on the structure of Mont Blanc and its environs. In these papers he attributed cleavage and foliation to the same cause, but fell into some errors, as was not surprising, in regard to Alpine geology. A subsequent paper (Quart. Journ. Geol. Soc. xii. 102), 'On the last Elevation of the Alps, with notices of the heights at which the sea has left traces of its action on their sides,' was even then contested, and would be now replaced by the words 'there are no traces.' But in such a difficult subject a careful and sound geologist might be, at that epoch, easily misled. Much of his work is of a high order. He also paid much attention to fossils, especially those of the neocomian and cretaceous systems. In the Royal Society's 'Catalogue of Scientific Papers' he appears as author of twenty-six and joint author of two papers, and was engaged at the time of his death on a memoir for the Palæontographical Society on the mollusca of the chalk (three parts published, stopping in cephalopoda).

His work as a geologist was combined with activity in business, but he was also a student of philology and archaeology, and employed himself in deciphering the inscriptions brought from Lycia by Sir Charles Fellows [q. v.], Edward Forbes [q. v.], and Thomas Abel Brimage Spratt [q. v.] In debate he is described as 'severely critical and somewhat sarcastic;' but he was also known as a kind-hearted, benevolent man, much interested in the education of the poor. He was a Fellow of the Linnean and Zoological societies, was elected F.R.S. in 1850, became treasurer of the Geological Society in 1853, and its president early in 1856. But on 20 May of that year, while riding near Norwood, he was thrown from his horse; and he died at his lodgings in Soho Square from fracture of the skull, 31 May, being buried in the churchyard of St. John's (the parish) Church, Hampstead. He was unmarried.

[Obituary Notices in the Literary Gaz., Journal of Archaeology, Science and Art, 7 June 1856, p. 361; Proc. Linnean Soc. 1857, vol. xxi.; Proc. Roy. Soc. viii. 275; Quart. Journ. Geol. Soc. vol. xiii. Proc. p. xlv (the last contains an unusually full critical account of Sharpe's geological work. There are references to his part in the Cambrian-Silurian controversy in Geikie's Life of Murchison); a critical summary of his views on cleavage is given by J. Phillips, Brit. Assoc. Report, 1856, pp. 376-83; information from W. Arthur Sharpe, esq. (nephew).] T. G. B.

SHARPE, EDMUND (1809-1877), architect, only son of Francis Sharpe, of Heathfield, Knutsford, Cheshire, was born there on 31 Oct. 1809. He was educated at Dr. Burney's school at Greenwich and at Sedbergh, whence he proceeded to St. John's College, Cambridge, graduating B.A. in 1833 and M.A. in 1836 (Graduati Cantabr. 1830-1884, p. 467). In 1832 he was elected travelling bachelor of arts for the university, and, selecting architecture as his thesis, devoted three years to the study of the subject in France and Germany. He then became a pupil of John Rickman [q. v.], and in 1836 established himself at Lancaster, where he practised as an architect for fifteen years, erecting during that time about forty churches, chiefly in the romanesque style, besides mansions and other buildings. During his residence at Lancaster, Sharpe took a leading part in the execution of various projects for improving the sanitary condition of the town, of which he was elected mayor in 1848. In 1831 he withdrew from the practice of architecture, having taken up engineering work, especially the construction of railways, in which he was largely engaged for many years. In 1857 he went to reside on a property he had purchased near Bettws-y-coed, North Wales. In 1839 he was appointed J.P. for Lancashire, and also for Denbighshire. From 1863 to 1866 Sharpe resided on the continent, being occupied with the construction of tramways at Geneva and a railway at Perpignan; in 1867 he returned to Lancaster, where he afterwards chiefly resided.

Throughout his life Sharpe was an enthusiastic and profound student of mediæval architecture, and he published several highly valuable works on the subject, of which the first and most important was 'Architectural Parallels, or the Progress of Ecclesiastical Architecture in England during the Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries,' 1848; this was followed by 'Decorated Windows, a series of Illustrations of the Window Tracing of the decorated Style,' 1849; 'The Seven Periods of Architecture,' 1851, in which he advocated a new system of nomenclature for the successive styles of mediæval work; 'The Mouldings of the Six Periods of British Architecture,' 1874; 'The Architecture of the Cistercians,' 1874; and several others. His minor publications were numerous. In 1875 Sharpe received the gold medal of the Institute of British Architects, of which he had been elected a fellow in 1848; he was also a fellow of the Archaeological Institute, and contributed many papers to the proceedings of both societies. In 1869 he joined the Architectural Association, which, during the next few years at his suggestion and under his guidance, made annual excursions for the study of Gothic architecture in England and France. An account of the last of these, 'A Visit to the Domed Churches of Charente in 1875,' with a memoir of Sharpe and a complete list of his publications, was drawn up and printed by the association after his death, as a memorial to him. Sharpe died at Milan, after a brief illness, on 8 May 1877, and was buried at Lancaster. By his wife, Elizabeth Fletcher, to whom he was married in 1843, and who died in 1876, he had three sons and two daughters. A woodcut portrait of him appeared in the 'Builder' for 1870, p. 1026.

[A Visit to the Domed Churches of Charente; Builder, 1877, pp. 491, 562; Dict. of Architecture.] F. M. O'D.

SHARPE, GREGORY (1713-1771), theologian, a native of Yorkshire, born in 1713, was for some time educated at Hull grammar school, and then at Westminster school under Dr. Freind. At Westminster he committed some irregularity, and from the summer of 1731 he lived for four years at Aberdeen with Thomas Blackwell the younger. On 2 June 1735 he was admitted fellow commoner at Trinity College, Cambridge, graduating LL.B. in 1738. He was again entered at Trinity College on 8 June 1747, and then proceeded LL.D. On 4 July 1751 he was incorporated at Oxford.

Sharpe took orders in the English church, and was for some time minister of Broadway Chapel, Westminster. From 1748 to 1756 he was vicar of All Saints, Birling, near Maidstone. He was installed as prebendary of Yetminster secunda in Salisbury Cathedral on 18 March 1757, and held it until his death. He was chaplain to Frederick, Prince of Wales, and to George III. On the death of Dr. Samuel Nicolls in 1763, he was elected to the mastership of the Temple, where William Maxwell, D.D. (1732-1818) [q.v.], was his assistant. An account of his prayer for liberty and of Johnson's commentary on it is given in Boswell (ed. Hill), ii. 130. He died at the master's house in the Temple on 8 Jan. 1771. He was elected F.R.S. 9 May 1754, and at the time of his death was the director of the Society of Antiquaries (NICHOLS, Lit. Anecdotes, vi. 271). A mezzotint portrait of him by Valentine Green, from a painting by R. Cross, was published in 1777.

Sharpe was a good classical and oriental scholar. His library was sold on 8 April 1771 and ten following days, and a priced catalogue is at the British Museum. It included 'a fine collection of oriental manuscripts,' and many valuable prints and drawings; the whole fetched 577*l.* 1*s.* His publications comprised: 1. 'A Review of the Controversy on the meaning of Demoniacs in the New Testament, by a Lover of Truth,' 1739; criticised in 'A Short State of the Controversy on Demoniacs,' 1739, and by Thomas Hutchinson in a volume of 'Remarks.' 2. 'A Defence of Dr. Samuel Clarke against Lewis Philip Thummig in favour of Leibnitz' (anon.), 1744. 3. 'A Short Dissertation on the Misgovernment called an Oligarchy' (anon.), 1748. 4. 'A Dissertation on the Latin Tongue,' 1751. 5. 'Two Dissertations: I. upon the Origin of Language; II, upon the original powers of Letters with second edition of a Hebrew Grammar and Lexicon, without Points,' 1751; from this were derived the 'greatest part of the Directions and the whole of the Dictionary' in an anonymous 'Manual for the Hebrew Psalter,' Glasgow, 1781. 6. 'Introduction to Universal History, translated from the Latin of Baron Holberg,' 1755; 2nd ed. 1758; 3rd ed. by William Radcliffe, B.A. of Oriel College, Oxford, 1787. 7. 'Argument in Defence of Christianity, from the Concessions of the most antient Adversaries,' 1755. It was followed by 8. 'A second Argument, taken from the Ancient Prophecies,' 1762. 9. 'A Short Review of Mr. Hooke's Observations on the Roman Senate and Dionysius of Halicarnassus,' 1758. 10. 'Origin and Structure of the Greek Tongue,' 1767; new ed. 1777.

Sharpe translated the 'Frogs' in the third volume of Father Brumoy's work on the 'Greek Theatre,' which was edited by Mrs. Charlotte Lennox in 1759. He published in 1766 John Locke's 'Observations on Vine and Olives,' from the original manuscript, with the fourth Earl of Shaftesbury, and about the same date revised Martyn's life of the first earl, which was edited by Kippis about 1700. In 1767 he collected and edited the dissertations of Thomae Hyde [q. v.]

A volume of Sharpe's 'Sermons on various Subjects' was published under the editorship of the Rev. Joseph Robertson in 1772. Letters by him are printed in the 'Gentleman's Magazine,' 1773, pp. 545-6, Seward's 'Supplement to the Anecdotes' (1797), v. 177-82, and in Nichols's 'Illustrations of Literature,' iii. 692, and two volumes of his unpublished correspondence are mentioned by Chalmers in his 'Biographical Dictionary.' He was a frequent contributor to the 'Monthly Review.'

[Gent. Mag. 1771 p. 47, 1796 i. 5; Le Neve's Fasti, ii. 673-5; Nichols's Lit. Anecdotes, iii. 501; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1715-1886; Fielding's Maling, p. 164; Halkett and Laing's Anon. Lit. pp. 590, 1418, 1472, 2108, 2365, 2373, information from Mr. W. Aldis Wright, Trinity College, Cambridge; Cooke's Benchers of the Inner Temple, p. 136.] W. P. C.

SHARPE, JAMES (1677?-1630), Roman catholic divine, born in Yorkshire about 1677, was perhaps connected with the family of Sharp of Little Horton. He became a convert to Roman catholicism, and, entering St. Alban's College at Valladolid on 21 June 1602, was ordained priest on 14 April 1604. He was admitted a member of the Society of Jesus in 1607-8, and for a time was professor of sacred scripture and Hebrew at the English Jesuit College at Louvain. In 1611 he was sent to England, where he made it his first endeavour to bring about the conversion of his parents. They, however, refused to listen to him, and kept him in strict confinement, seeking to reconvert him to protestantism. He obtained his liberty by proclaiming himself a priest, but thereby incurred the penalty of banishment. After a brief sojourn in Belgium he returned to England under the name of Francis Pollard, and was serving in the Yorkshire district in 1621. On 12 May 1622 he was professed of the four vows, and in 1625 he was labouring in Lincolnshire. In 1628 he had removed to Leicestershire; but he died in Lincolnshire, at the residence of St. Dominic, on 11 Nov. 1630.

He was the author of 'The Examination of the Private Spirit of Protestants.' The only edition of the complete work now extant is dated 1640. There was an earlier edition, for a second part, entitled 'The Triall of the Protestant Private Spirit, the Second Part, which is Doctrinal,' is dated 1635. Sharpe also left a manuscript endorsed 'Annals of F. Pollard]. Divers examples of cruelty and persecution in England, especially about York, and of the constancy of Catholics in the time of King James, 1610, 14 Oct.,' which is now at Stonyhurst College, and which has been printed in Morris's 'Troubles of our Catholic Forefathers,' 3rd ser.

[Foley's Records of the English Province of the Society of Jesus, ii. 617-26, v. 767, vii. 702, 1451; More's Hist. Prov. Angl. p. 359; De Backer's Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 1869, iii. 778.] E. I. C.

SHARPE, LEWIS (fl. 1640), dramatist, lived in the reign of Charles I. He is known as the author of the 'Noble Stranger,' a comedy which was first acted 'at the Private House in Salisbury Court, by Her Majesty's servants,' and was printed, in 4to, for James Decket, of the Inner Temple Gate, Fleet Street. It is dedicated to 'the Worthy Knight, Sir Edmund Williams,' and is prefaced with eulogistic verses by Richard Woolfall. From these it appears to have been a popular piece, frequently acted. Langbaine speaks highly of the play, especially commending the parts of Pupillus and Mercutio. The British Museum contains two copies.

A younger contemporary, ROGER SHARPE (fl. 1610), poet, is known as the author of 'More Pooles yet. Written by R. S.—At London. Printed by Thomas Castleton' (1610, 4to). An address to the reader is signed Roger Sharpe. The work, which consists of a collection of epigrams, is of extreme rarity. A copy is in the Malou collection in the Bodleian, which formerly belonged to Narcissus Luttrell [q. v.] (COLLIER, Bibliogr. Catalogue, pp. 340-2; ARBER, Transcript of the Stationers' Register, iv. 196; HAZLITT, Handbook, p. 552).

[Langbaine's Account of the English Dramatic Poets, p. 336; Baker's Biographia Dramatica, i. 649, iii. 85; Fleay's Biogr. Chronicle of the British Drama, ii. 232.] E. I. C.

SHARPE, LOUISA, afterwards Mrs. SEYFARTH (1798-1843), watercolour-painter born in 1798, was the third daughter of William Sharpe, a Birmingham engraver. Her father brought her and her three sisters, who all practised art, to London about 1816.

Louisa, the most gifted of the four sisters, commenced as a miniature-painter, exhibiting portraits at the Royal Academy from 1817 to 1829, when she was elected a member of the 'Old' Watercolour Society. She then turned to costume subjects, and her domestic and sentimental scenes and illustrations to the poets were much admired for their graceful treatment and exquisite finish. Many of these were engraved for the 'Keepsake' and 'Forget-me-not' annuals and Heath's 'Book of Beauty' between 1829 and 1839. In 1834 Miss Sharpe married Professor Woldemar Seyffarth of Dresden, and thenceforth resided in that city, continuing to exhibit in Pall Mall until her death at Dresden on 28 Jan. 1843. Her daughter Agnæ exhibited drawings occasionally at the Royal Academy and the Suffolk Street gallery between 1850 and 1859.

CHARLOTTE SHARPE (d. 1849), the eldest of the family, painted portraits, beginning to exhibit in 1817. On her early marriage with a Captain Morris, she for a time gave up painting, but domestic troubles compelled her to resume the profession, at which she worked for the support of her family until her death in 1849.

ELIZA SHARPE (1796-1874), the second sister, began her career as a miniaturist, and was elected in 1829 of the 'Old' Watercolour Society, to the exhibitions of which she contributed at intervals for forty years. Her drawings were of the same class as those of her sister Louisa, but inferior in composition and execution; some of them were engraved for the same publications. She retired from membership of the 'Old' Watercolour Society in 1872. Towards the end of her life Eliza Sharpe was employed in making watercolour copies of pictures in the South Kensington Museum, her last work being a set of copies of Raphael's cartoons. She died unmarried on 11 June 1874 at the residence of her nephew, Mr. C. W. Sharpe the engraver, at Burnham, Maidenhead. A humorous drawing by her of herself and two of her sisters is in the print-room of the British Museum.

MARY ANN SHARPE (d. 1867), the youngest of the sisters, exhibited portraits and domestic subjects first at the Royal Academy and afterwards with the Society of British Artists, of which she was elected an honorary member in 1880.

[Rogers's Hist. of the Old Watercolour Society; Clayton's English Female Artists, 1876; Art Journal, 1874; Graves's Dict. of Artists, 1760-1893; private information.]

F. M. O'D.

SHARPE, SAMUEL (1799-1881), Egyptologist and translator of the Bible, second son of Sutton Sharpe (1756-1806), brewer, by his second wife, Maria (d. 1806), third daughter of Thomas Rogers, banker, was born in King Street, Golden Square, London, on 8 March 1799, and baptised at St. James's, Piccadilly. His mother, a descendant of Philip Henry [q. v.], was sister of Samuel Rogers [q. v.] the poet. On her death, followed by his father's failure, he found a second mother in his half-sister Catherine. Daniel Sharpe [q. v.] was his younger brother. At midsummer 1807 Samuel became a boarder in the school of Eliezer Cogan [q. v.] at Higham Hill, Walthamstow; at Christmas 1814 he was taken into the banking-house of his uncles Samuel and Henry Rogers, at 29 Clement's Lane, Lombard Street; and remained connected with the firm till 1861, having been made partner in 1824. Punctuality and caution made him a successful man of business. Brought up in the creed of the established church, he came gradually to adopt the unitarian views held by his mother's relatives; in 1821 he joined the congregation of William Johnson Fox [q. v.] at South Place, Finsbury. For many years Sharpe and his brothers taught classes, before office hours, in the Lancasterian school, Harp Alley, Farringdon Street. He was elected a fellow of the Geological Society about 1827, but took a greater interest in mathematical science and archæological research, as his contributions (1828-31) to the 'Philosophical Magazine' show.

His interest in Egyptology was excited by the labours of Thomas Young, M.D. (1773-1829) [q. v.]. He studied the works of Champollion and all that had been then published by Sir John Gardner Wilkinson [q. v.], learned Coptic, and formed a hieroglyphical vocabulary. Before publishing his first book, 'The Early History of Egypt' (1830), he consulted his uncle, Samuel Rogers, who said, 'Why, surely you can do it if Wilkinson can; his only thought is where to buy his kid gloves.' The first part (spring of 1837) of his 'Egyptian Inscriptions,' chiefly from the British Museum, contained 'the largest body of hieroglyphical writing that had yet been published,' and was followed by additional series in 1841 and 1855. His 'Vocabulary of Hieroglyphics' was published in the autumn of 1837; in the introduction he thus states his general method of investigation: 'Granted a sentence in which most of the words are already known, required the meaning of others;' he allows that the results are often tentative, and admits that the problem cannot always be thus set. In addition to his extreme patience, he had for this kind of verbal divination a natural gift; often amusing his friends by the facility with which in a few minutes he would read off a difficult cryptogram. In the autumn of 1838 appeared his 'History of Egypt under the Ptolemies;' in 1842 his 'History of Egypt under the Romans;' these were incorporated with the 'Early History' in 'The History of Egypt,' 1846. Other publications followed in the same line of research, but on these his reputation as an Egyptologist must rest. The pains and skill of his workmanship are unquestioned; but he worked very much on his own lines, and on many points his conclusions have not won acceptance. He said of himself, 'I am a heretic in everything, even among unitarians.'

Sharpe's labours as a translator of the Bible began with a revision (1840) of the authorised version of the New Testament. His Greek text was that of Griesbach, and to this he always adhered, taking little interest in the progress of purely textual studies. His revision of the authorised version of the Old Testament was first issued in 1865. In eight editions of his New Testament, and four of his Old, he devoted incessant and minute care to the improvement of his work. As a translator he was distinguished less by originality of scholarship than by excellence of judgment; he is successful beyond others in the difficult experiment of removing the archaisms without impairing the venerable dignity of the English Bible. Among the last advocates of unpointed Hebrew, he published manuals for instruction in this system; his plan of printing his Hebrew extracts with capital letters, for the proper names and the beginnings of sentences, seems unique, and convenient for the learner. His 'History of the Hebrew Nation and its Literature,' 1869, and his exegetical works have merits akin to those of his Egyptian studies, and bear the same individual stamp. When, in 1870, the project of a revised version was undertaken by the convocation of Canterbury, Sharpe was one of four scholars of his denomination invited to select a member of their body to co-operate with the New Testament company.

In purely theological controversy he took little part, though he was a zealous propagandist in directions tending in his judgment to promote the union of knowledge and piety. His various benefactions to University College and School, London, considerably exceeded 15,000*l*. To his own denomination he was an unobtrusive and munificent benefactor. For its weekly organ, 'The Inquirer,' founded in 1843 by Edward Hill, he worked constantly for some years, though he thought newspaper writing 'a bad employment.' He resumed it, however, in 1876 when the 'Christian Life' was started by his friend Robert Spears, writing a weekly article till his death. He had contributed papers, chiefly biblical, to the 'Christian Reformer' (1834-63) with the signature 'S. S.,' and to many minor periodicals. He was a trustee of Dr. Daniel Williams's foundations, 1853-1857; president of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in 1869-70, and president of Manchester College (now at Oxford) in 1876-8.

Simple in his habits, plain in his tastes, methodical in all his ways, quaint and terse in conversation, uniformly gentle in his demeanour, Sharpe spent his later days in tranquil retirement. His house was the resort of his literary friends, and of younger men whom he delighted to imbue with his own enthusiasm for his favourite pursuits. He died at 32 Highbury Place on 28 July 1881, and was buried at Abney Park cemetery on 3 Aug. He married (1827) his first cousin Sarah (b. 1796, d. 3 June 1851), daughter of Joseph Sharpe, and had six children, of whom two daughters survived him.

He published, besides a few doctrinal tracts

1836,

fol

3. 'Rudiments of a Vocabulary of Egyptian Hieroglyphics,' 1837, 4to.
4. 'The History of Egypt under the Ptolemies,' 1838, 4to.
5. 'The New Testament, translated,' 1840, 12mo; 8th edit. 1861, 8vo.
6. 'The History of Egypt under the Romans,' 1842, 8vo.
7. 'Notes on the Hieroglyphics of Horapollon Nilous,' 1845 (Syro-Egyptian Society).
8. 'The History of Egypt from the earliest Times till A.D. 640,' 1846, 8vo; 6th edit. 1876, 8vo, 2 vols.; in German from the 3rd edit. (1852) by Jolowicz, revised by Von Gutschmid, Leipzig, 1862, 8vo, 2 vols.
9. 'The Chronology and Geography of Ancient Egypt,' 1849, 8vo (in co-operation with Joseph Bonomi, the younger [q. v.])
10. 'Fragments of Orations in Accusation and Defence of Demosthenes . . . translated,' 1849, 8vo.
11. 'Sketch of Assyrian History,' in Bonomi's 'Nineveh and its Palaces,' 2nd edit. 1853, 8vo.
12. 'The Triple Mummy Case of Aro-eri Ao,' 1858.
13. 'Historical Notice of the Monuments of Egypt' in Owen Jones and Bonomi's 'Description of the Egyptian Court in the Crystal Palace,' 1854, 8vo.
14. 'Historic Notes on the . . . Old and New Testaments,' 1854, 12mo; 3rd edit. 1858, 8vo.
15. 'Critical Notes on the . . . New Testament,' 1856, 8vo; 1867, 8vo.
16. 'Alexandrian Chronology,' 1857, 4to.

17. 'Some Particulars of the Life of Samuel Rogers,' 1859, 4to; 1860, 4to. 18. 'Egyptian Hieroglyphics,' 1861, 8vo. 19. 'Egyptian Antiquities in the British Museum, described,' 1862, 8vo. 20. 'Notes' in Bonomi's 'Egypt, Nubia, and Ethiopia,' 1862, 4to. 21. 'Egyptian Mythology and Egyptian Christianity,' 1863, 12mo. 22. 'Sketch of the Arguments for . . . authorship . . . of the Pentateuch,' [1863], 12mo. 23. 'The Alabaster Sarcophagus of Oimeneptah,' 1864, 4to. 24. 'The Hebrew Scriptures, translated,' 1865, 8vo, 3 vols.: 4th edit. 1881, 8vo in one volume with New Testament. 25. 'The Chronology of the Bible,' &c., 1868, 8vo. 26. 'Texts from the Bible explained by . . . Ancient Monuments,' 1866, 8vo; 1869, 1880 (drawings by Bonomi). 27. 'The History of the Hebrew Nation and its Literature,' 1869, 8vo; 5th edit. 1892, 8vo. 28. 'The Decree of Canopus; in Hieroglyphics and Greek, with translations,' 1870, 8vo. 29. 'The Rosetta Stone; in Hieroglyphics and Greek, with translations,' 1871, 8vo. 30. 'Short Notes to . . . translation of the Hebrew Scriptures,' 1874, 8vo. 31. 'Hebrew Inscriptions from the valleys between Egypt and Mount Sinai,' 1875, 8vo; part ii. 1876, 8vo. 32. 'The Journeys and Epistles of St. Paul,' 1876, 16mo; 3rd edit. [1880], 8vo. 33. 'The Book of Isaiah arranged chronologically in a revised translation . . . with . . . Notes,' 1877, 8vo. 34. 'A Short Hebrew Grammar without Points,' 1877, 8vo. 35. 'The Book of Genesis . . . without Points,' 1879, 8vo (selections). 36. 'An Inquiry into the Age of the Moabite Stone,' &c., 1879, 12mo. 37. 'Βαπτάσα Ἐπιστολή. The Epistle of Barnabas . . . with a translation,' 1880, 8vo.

[Clayden's Samuel Sharpe, 1883; Christian Life, 7 Oct. 1876 (portrait), 6 and 13 Aug. 1881; Athenæum, 6 Aug. 1881; Lawrence's Descendants of Philip Henry, 1844, p. 51; Jeremy's Presbyterian Fund, 1885, p. 213.]

A. G.

SHARPEIGH, ALEXANDER (fl. 1607-1613), merchant and sea-captain, seems to have been in the opening years of the seventeenth century a factor of the Levant company at Constantinople (Lansdowne MS. 241, f. 188), in which capacity he probably acquired some knowledge of Arabic. Early in 1608 he was appointed by the East India Company to be captain of their ship Ascension, and general of the fourth voyage to the East Indies. The two ships, Ascension and Union, sailed from Woolwich on 14 March 1607-8, and from Plymouth on the 31st. Touching at Grand Canary and at the Cape Verde Islands, they arrived on 14 July in Saldanha, or, as it is now called, Table Bay. There they remained till 20 Sept., when they sailed to the eastward; but the night coming on stormy and dark, the two ships lost sight of each other and did not again meet. Touching on the way at the Comorro Islands, at Pemba, where her men had a severe conflict with the natives and some white Moors, and at Almirante, the Ascension came to Socotra on 29 March 1609, and on 10 April crossed over to Aden, where the governor, having invited Sharpeigh on shore, as though to a conference, kept him and his attendants close prisoners for six weeks, and released them only on payment of goods to the value of two thousand five hundred dollars. Getting away from Aden without further attempt to trade, Sharpeigh went to Mocha, where there was 'a good market for English commodities.' Thence he returned to Socotra in August and sailed for Surat. On 28 Aug. the ship arrived at Mowa, where they could have got a pilot for Surat for twenty dollars. The master, however, refused, saying that he was able to take the ship in himself. On the 29th he tried it, missed the channel, and stuck the ship on the bar, where in three days she broke up. With some difficulty the men got on shore to Gandavi, where they were kindly received by the governor. On 9 Sept. they reached Surat, but were not allowed into the town. They remained in a neighbouring village till the end of the month, and then set out for Agra, which Sharpeigh, deserted by most of his men, reached almost alone after a tedious journey, and was well received by William Hawkyns, then residing in that place [see HAWKINS or HAWKINS, WILLIAM, fl. 1595]. In October 1611 he embarked on board the Trade's Increase at Surat, with Sir Henry Middleton. It would seem that in 1613 he was agent for the company at Bantam (Calendar of State Papers, East Indies, 1513-1616, No. 646), but the notice is vague, and his name does not occur again.

[Purchas his Pilgrimes, vol. i. bk. iii. ch. ix.; Kerr's Collection of Voyages, viii. 314; Markham's Voyages of Sir James Lancaster (Hakluyt Soc.); Calendar of State Papers, East Indies, 1513-1616; Notes kindly supplied by William Foster, esq., of the India Office.] J. K. L.

SHARPEY, WILLIAM (1802-1880), physiologist, posthumous son of Henry Sharpy (as he spelt the name) and Mary Balfour his wife, was born on 1 April 1802 at Arbroath in Forfarshire, whither his father, a ship-owner and a native of Folkestone in Kent, had migrated some years previously. He was educated at the public school in his native town until he entered the university of Edinburgh, in November 1817, to study the humanities and to attend the class of natural philosophy. He commenced his medical studies in 1818, learning anatomy from Dr. John Barclay, who then lectured in the extra-academical school. He was admitted a member of the Edinburgh College of Surgeons in 1821, when he came to London to continue his anatomical work in the private school of Joshua Brookes in Blenheim Street. He proceeded to Paris in the autumn, and remained there for nearly a year, learning clinical surgery from Dupuytren in the wards of the Hôtel Dieu, and operative surgery from Lisfranc. Here he made the acquaintance of James Syme [q. v.], with whom he kept up an active correspondence until Syme's death in 1870. In August 1823 he graduated M.D. at Edinburgh with the inaugural thesis 'De Ventriculi Carcinomate,' and he afterwards returned to Paris, where he spent the greater part of 1824. He then appears to have settled for a time in Arbroath, where he began to practise under his step-father, Dr. Arrott; but, finding himself unsuited for private practice, he from the end of 1826 devoted himself to pure science. Setting out for the continent with knapsack on back and staff in hand, he trudged through France to Switzerland, and thence to Rome and Naples. He turned his steps northward again in the spring of 1828, and, passing through Bologna, he stayed at Padua to work under Panizza, and came by way of Venice to Innsbruck. The summer was spent in Austria, and he reached Berlin in August. He dissected here for nine months under Professor Rudolphi, and went thence to Heidelberg, to be under Tiedemann, and afterwards to Vienna. Having thus acquired a thorough acquaintance with the best methods of continental teaching, he established himself in Edinburgh in 1829, and in the following year he obtained the fellowship of the College of Surgeons of Edinburgh, presenting a probationary essay 'On the Pathology and Treatment of False Joints.' The diploma of fellow qualified him to become a teacher in Edinburgh; but in 1831 he again spent three months in Berlin, and it was not until 1831-2 that, in conjunction with Dr. Allen Thomson [q. v.], who taught physiology, he gave a first course of lectures upon systematic anatomy in the extra-mural school in Edinburgh. The association of Sharpey with Thomson lasted during the remainder of Sharpey's stay in Edinburgh.

From 1829 till 1836 Sharpey was actively engaged in scientific work, of which the earliest outcome was his paper on ciliary motion, published in 1830. He was elected a fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh in 1834, and in July 1836 he was appointed to the chair of anatomy and physiology in the university of London (now University College), in succession to Jones Quain [q. v.]. In this capacity Sharpey gave the first complete course of lectures upon physiology and minute anatomy, as these terms are now understood; for physiology had been hitherto regarded as an appendage to anatomy. His lectures proved of the greatest importance; they were models both in matter and form. They were continued for the long period of thirty-eight years, and were always largely attended.

Sharpey was appointed in 1840 one of the examiners in anatomy at the university of London, a post he occupied for many years, and he was also a member of the senate of the London University. He was elected a fellow of the Royal Society on 9 May 1839. He was made a member of its council in 1844, and was appointed one of the secretaries in place of Thomas Bell (1792-1880) [q. v.] in November 1853, an office which he held until his retirement, owing to the failure of his eyesight in 1872. He was also for fifteen years, from April 1861, one of the members appointed by the crown on the general council of medical education and registration. He acted as one of the treasurers of this council, and took a deep interest in the various subjects connected with medical education and the polity of the medical profession. Sharpey was also one of the trustees of the Hunterian Museum, which is maintained by the Royal College of Surgeons of England, and in 1859 he received the degree of honorary LL.D. from the university of Edinburgh.

About 1871 he retired from the post of secretary of the Royal Society, and in 1874 from his professorship at University College, but he continued to haunt the scene of his former labours until he died. Mr. Gladstone's government in 1874 accorded him an annual pension of 150*l.*, in recognition of his services as a teacher and a man of science. He died of bronchitis at 50 Torrington Square, London, on Sunday, 11 April 1880, and was buried in the abbey graveyard at Arbroath.

The qualities which chiefly distinguished Sharpey were the variety of his knowledge, the accuracy of his memory, and his sound discrimination in all matters of doubt or controversy. Among his pupils were Professor Michael Foster and Professor Burdon Sanderson, by whose efforts the Cambridge, Oxford, and London schools of physiology have been remodelled. Great as were Sharpey's services to physiology, his guidance of the Royal Society during a period when changes were taking place in its administration was no less important, not only to the society itself, but to science in this country. Like every great teacher, Sharpey possessed the power of attaching his pupils by ties of personal affection as well as those of common scientific interests.

Sharpey wrote comparatively little; he preferred to act as editor and referee rather than author. His few papers are of lasting value. They are: 1. 'De Ventriculi Carcinomate,' 8vo, Edinburgh, 1828. 2. 'A Probationary Essay on the Pathology and Treatment of False Joints,' Edinburgh, 1820. 3. 'On a Peculiar Motion excited in Fluids of the Surfaces of Certain Animals' ('Edinburgh Medical and Surgical Journal,' 1830, xxxiv. 118). 4. 'Remarks on a supposed Spontaneous Motion of the Blood' ('Edinburgh Journal of Nat. and Geographical Science,' 1831). 5. 'An Account of Professor Ehrenberg's Researches on the Infusoria' ('Edinburgh Nat. Philosophical Journal,' 1833, vol. xv.) 6. 'Account of the Discovery by Purkinje and Valentin of Ciliary Motions in Reptiles and Warm-blooded Animals, with Remarks and Additional Experiments' ('Edinburgh Nat. Philosophical Journal,' 1835, vol. xix.) The information contained in articles 5 and 6 is embodied in his contribution on 'Cilia' to Todd and Bowman's 'Cyclopædia of Anatomy and Physiology,' published in 1836. Sharpey also wrote the valuable article on 'Echinodermata' in this 'Cyclopædia.' He edited the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth editions of Jones Quain's 'Elements of Anatomy,' and contributed important information to Baly's translation of Muller's 'Physiology,' 1837 and 1840.

As a memorial of Sharpey's services to University College, an excellent bust by W. H. Thornycroft was placed in the museum there at the expense of his pupils and friends. There is also a full-length oil painting by John Prescott Knight, R.A. [q. v.], in the council room of University College. The bust is the happier likeness.

[Obituary notices in the Proceedings of the Royal Society, 1880, vol. xxii. pp. x-xix, and in Nature, 1880, xi. 567; letters in Paterson's Life of James Syme, Edinburgh, 1874; Arbroath Parish Register, in the office of the registrar-general for Scotland.] D.A. P.

SHARPHAM, EDWARD (1576-1608), dramatist, third son of Richard Sharpham of Colehanger, a manor in the parish of East Allington, Devonshire, by his wife Mary, was baptised at East Allington 26 July 1576. His mother married 2ndly Alexander Hexte (d. 1558) of Staverton, 2 Oct. 1592. Edward was admitted a member of the Middle Temple 9 Oct. 1594, and was fined 20s. for absence Christmas 1595 and on 21 May 1596; he was not called to the bar. He may be author of the 'coney-catching' tract, 'The Discoverie of the Knights of the Post,' by 'E. S.' (1597). He was author of two plays, 'The Fleire' and 'Cupid's Whirligig.' The former was acted at Blackfriars in 1605-6, and on several other occasions, by the children of the revels (4 edits.—1607, 1610, 1615, and 1631). The play resembles Marston's 'Parasitaster.' 'Cupid's Whirligig' was likewise acted at Blackfriars by the children of his majesty's revels in 1607 (4 edits.—1607, 1611, 1616, 1630). There are dedicatory verses to Sharpham's friend, Robert Hayman [q. v.] The plot is borrowed in part from Boccaccio (Dec. vii. 6). Sharpham was buried in St. Margaret's churchyard, Westminster, on 23 April 1608. His will, dated the day before, was proved 9 May 1608. John Owen, one of the witnesses, may have been the epigrammatist.

Verses, signed E. S., prefixed to Henry Peacham's 'Minerva Britannia,' and a sonnet, 'To my beloved master, John Davies,' prefixed to Davies's 'Humours Heav'n on Earth,' and signed Edward Sharpell, have both been wrongly assigned to Sharpham.

[Baker's Biogr. Dram. i. 649, ii. 146, 241; Fleay's Chron. of Engl. Drama, ii. 232; Hunter's Chorus Vatum, ii. 218; Waldron's Cont. of Ben Jonson's Sad Shepherd, p. 145; Notes and Queries, 10th ser. x. 21-4, where Prof. G. C. Moore Smith prints Sharpham's will, and gives new biogr. details.] E. I. C.

SHARPLES or SHARPLESS, JAMES (1750?-1811), portrait-painter, born about 1750 in England, of a Roman catholic family, was educated in France for the priesthood, but became a painter. From 1779 to 1785 he was an occasional exhibitor of portraits at the Royal Academy, residing in Cambridge. After marriage he went to America. On the voyage his ship was taken by the French, and Sharples and his family were detained as prisoners for some months. About 1796 he landed in New York, where he seems to have been known as Sharpless. Sharples usually painted small portraits in profile, mostly executed in pastels. He drew at Philadelphia in 1796 a small profile portrait of George Washington from the life. This he and his wife often copied. A copy by his wife is in the National Portrait Gallery with a similar portrait of Dr. Priestley. Sharples travelled about with his wife and family in a caravan of his own construction. He died at New York 6 Feb. 1811, being buried in the Roman catholic cemetery.

He left a widow, two sons, and a daughter. His elder son, Felix Sharples, remained in America, where he practised as an artist, and died in North Carolina. His widow, Mrs. Ellen Sharples (d. 1849), after her husband's death, returned with her younger son, James Sharples (d. 1839), and her daughter, Rolinda Sharples (see below), to England. They resided for some little time in London, and all three occasionally exhibited portraits at the Royal Academy. Eventually they settled at Bristol Hot-Wells, where they continued to practise their art. Mrs. Sharples, who survived her whole family, in 1845 gave 2,000*l.* towards the foundation of an academy for the promotion of the fine arts at Bristol, which, after her death in March 1849, was supplemented by a bequest of 3,465*l.* From these sums was erected the present Bristol Academy, which contains samples of paintings by various members of the Sharples family.

ROLINDA SHARPLES (d. 1838), who was an honorary member of the Society of British Artists, painted some works on a larger scale, such as 'The Trial of the Bristol Rioters' (1832) and 'Clifton Racecourse' (1836), each picture containing a number of small portraits. She died at Bristol on 10 Feb. 1838.

[Redgrave's Dict. of Artists; Dunlap's Hist. of the Arts of Design in the United States; Baker's Engraved Portraits of Washington; Graves's Dict. of Artists, 1760-1893; information from Robert Hall Warren, esq.] L. C.

SHARPLES, JAMES (1825-1893), blacksmith and artist, born at Wakefield in Yorkshire in 1825, was one of the thirteen children of a working ironfounder, and began work at Bury in his father's calling from an early age. He got but scanty education, but obtained practice in drawing from drawing designs of boilers on the floor of the workshop in which he was employed. He was encouraged at home to practise drawing, and became expert in copying lithographs and engravings. When aged 16 he entered the Bury Mechanics' Institution in order to attend a drawing class held there. With the help of Burnet's 'Practical Treatise on Painting' he made further progress during his leisure hours, and even tried painting in oils. Undeterred by failures, he continued to try and teach himself, making his own easel, palette, &c., and buying brushes and canvas with money which he earned by working overtime. Then, by studying Flaxman's 'Anatomical Principles,' given him by his brother, and Brook Taylor's 'Principles of Perspective,' he acquired sufficient skill to complete a picture of 'The Forge,' besides painting portraits. He soon found himself able to give up his work at the foundry, but returned to it on finding how uncertain the profession of an artist was. It being suggested that 'The Forge' should be engraved, Sharples set to work and engraved it himself by a process of his own, without ever having seen a plate engraved by anybody else. Another picture by Sharples, 'The Smithy,' has also been reproduced. He died in 1893 after a life of great industry.

[Smiles's Self-Help; Times, 15 June 1893.]

L. C.

SHARROCK, ROBERT (1630-1684), archdeacon of Winchester, baptised at Drayton Parolow, Buckinghamshire, on 29 June 1630 (parish reg.), was son of Robert Sharrock, rector of Drayton Parolow from 1630 to 1642, and of Adstock, Buckinghamshire, from March 1640 till his death in September 1671. His wife's name was Judith. The son Robert was admitted a scholar of Winchester school in 1643, whence he was elected fellow of New College, Oxford, on 5 March 1648-9 by the parliamentary visitors. He matriculated on 18 Nov. 1650, graduated B.C.L. on 12 Oct. 1654, and D.C.L. on 24 May 1661. He was presented to the college rectory of Horwood Magna in Buckinghamshire on 29 June 1665, and was installed prebendary of Winchester on 13 Sept. 1665. In 1664 he exchanged Horwood for the rectory of East Woodhay in Hampshire, which was nearer Winchester, succeeding his younger brother, Edmund (b. 1635), fellow of New College 1658-70. He became rector of Bishop-Waltham in Hampshire in 1669, and archdeacon of Winchester on 18 April 1684 (installed 21 April). He died on 11 July 1684. He married Frances, daughter of Edmund West, who survived him, and, dying on 29 Jan. 1691-2, was buried on 31 Jan. at Bishop-Waltham. His son Robert (1680?-1708) bequeathed to the bishopric of Lincoln the advowson of the rectory of Adstock, which had been purchased by his grandfather.

Wood says of Sharrock that he was 'accounted learned in divinity, in the civil and common law, and very knowing in vegetables, and all pertaining thereunto.' Historic interest attaches to his 'History of the Propagation and Improvement of Vegetables,' Oxford, 1680, 1688, 1672, his first published book, as the results of the researches of an early student of natural science, especially botany. It reappeared in London in 1694 with the title 'An Improvement to the Art of Gardening, or an exact History of Plants.' He also supplied prefaces to three of the physical treatises of Robert Boyle [q.v.], viz.: 'Some Considerations touching the Usefulness of Experimental Philosophy' (1663); 'New Experiments Physico-Mechanical' (1665); and 'A Defence of the Doctrine touching the Spring and Weight of the Air' (1669).

Sharrock's work on political philosophy, 'Υπόθεσις ἡθικῆς, De Officiis secundum Naturæ Jus,' was directed against Hobbes's views of ethics and politics (Oxford, 1660; Gotha, 1667; Oxford, 1682). It was quoted as of authority by Richard Cumberland (1631-1718) [q. v.] in his 'De Legibus Naturæ,' and by other philosophical writers.

Sharrock also published: 1. 'Judicia (seu Legum Censuræ) de variis Incontinentiæ speciebus,' Oxford, 1662; Tübingen, 1668.

2. 'Provinciale vetus Provinciæ Cantuariensis,' Oxford, 1663, 1664 (a collection of constitutions and statutes of the archbishops of Canterbury from 1222 to 1415, and of the cardinal legates Otho and Othobonus). 3. 'De Finibus Virtutis Christianæ,' Oxford, 1673. 4. 'Royal Table of the Laws of Humane Nature,' London, 1682 (a skeleton plan of his 'Υπόθεσις ἡθικῆς).

[Wood's Athenæ, ed. Bliss, iv. 147-8; Wood's Fasti, ed. Bliss, vol. ii. cols. 182, 250; Foster's Alumni; Kirby's Winchester Scholars, pp. 181, 186, 209; Le Neve's Fasti, ed. Hardy, iii. 27; Burrow's Reg. of Visitors of Oxford, pp. 169, 534; Lipscomb's Buckinghamshire, ii. 514, iii. 340; Hyde and Gale's Winchester, pp. 125-6, P. C. C. 27 Cannæ, 73 Barrett; Britten and Boulger's English Botanists; information from Rev. James P. Nash of Bishop-Waltham and Rev. C. F. Clark of Drayton Parslow.] B. P.

SHAW, ALEXANDER (1804-1890), surgeon, born 6 Feb. 1804, was the sixth son of Charles Shaw, clerk of the county of Ayr, and Barbara Wright his wife, daughter of a collector of customs at Greenock. John Shaw (1792-1827) [q. v.], Sir Charles Shaw [q. v.], and Patrick Shaw [q. v.], were elder brothers. While one sister, Marion, married Sir Charles Bell [q. v.], another sister became the wife of Professor George Joseph Bell [q. v.]. Alexander was educated at the Edinburgh high school, and afterwards went to the university of Glasgow, where he matriculated in 1819 and graduated M.A. 11 April 1822. Shaw was connected with the Middlesex Hospital for more than half a century. He entered there as a pupil in 1822; was made assistant surgeon in 1836, and surgeon in 1842. On his retirement in 1872 he was appointed consulting surgeon. He joined the medical school of the hospital at its first formation, and at the time of his death was the sole survivor of the original members of the staff. Meanwhile, with the idea of obtaining an M.D. degree, he was admitted as a pensioner at Downing College, Cambridge, 25 June 1826. In 1827, on the death of his brother John, Alexander left Cambridge to take up his work at the Great Windmill Street school. From this time all his energies were devoted to his professional work, and he abandoned the idea of taking his Cambridge degree. He passed the examination required to obtain the license of the Society of Apothecaries in 1827, and in the following year obtained the membership of the Royal College of Surgeons of England. On the institution of the fellowship of the college, Shaw was elected one of the first batch of fellows on 11 Dec. 1843. He served on the college council from 1858 to 1865.

Shaw took an active part in the work of the London medical societies. At the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society he served the offices of hon. secretary, vice-president, and treasurer, and in the 'Transactions' of that society he published some valuable papers on rickets. Sir Charles Bell married Marion, Shaw's sister, on 8 June 1811. After the death of her husband in 1842 Lady Bell lived with her brother, and their house became a centre for the literary and scientific society of the period. In 1869 he republished Sir Charles Bell's 'New Idea of the Anatomy of the Brain' (originally published in a limited edition in 1811) with additions, consisting chiefly of selected passages bearing on the same subject written by Bell before the publication of the 'New Idea' (see Journ. of Anat. and Physiol., 1869, iii. 147, and BELL, SIR CHARLES).

Shaw was a surgeon of repute, and, though incapacitated from work for some years before his death, never lost interest in his profession. He died 18 Jan. 1890, at the age of eighty-six. In 1856 Shaw married Susan Turner, the widow of Mr. J. Randall; the only issue of the marriage was a son who died in infancy. Mrs. Shaw died 18 March 1891.

His principal works are: 1. 'Narrative of the Discoveries of Sir Charles Bell in the Nervous System,' 1839. 2. 'Account of Sir Charles Bell's Classification of the Nervous System,' 1844. 3. 'On Sir Charles Bell's Researches in the Nervous System,' 1847. 4. 'An Account of Sir Charles Bell's Discoveries in the Nervous System,' prefixed to the sixth edition of Bell 'On the Hand,' and also published separately. Shaw wrote the articles on 'Injuries of the Back,' 'Diseases of the Spine,' and 'Distortion' in Holmes's 'System of Surgery.'

[Med. Chir. Trans. lxxiii. 23; Brit. Med. Journ. 1890, i. 393; Lancet, 1890, i. 327.]
J. B. B.

SHAW, SIR CHARLES (1795-1871), soldier, third son of Charles Shaw of Ayr, by his wife Barbara Wright, was born at Ayr in 1795. Alexander Shaw [q. v.], John Shaw (1792-1827) [q. v.], and Patrick Shaw [q. v.] were his brothers. He was educated in his native town and at the universities of St. Andrews and Edinburgh. He entered the army by purchase as ensign in the 62nd light infantry on 23 Jan. 1813, and joined the second battalion at Shorncliffe in March. From Shorncliffe Shaw went to Hythe, and at the end of November he accompanied his regiment to Ramsgate, where they embarked for Holland, landing at Tholenland on 19 Dec. He was engaged in the attack on, and capture of, the village of Merxem, near Antwerp, on 31 Jun. 1814, and, after serving through the campaign, was employed with his regiment to do garrison duty at Antwerp. On the escape of Napoleon from Elba, Shaw was sent to Courtrai towards the end of March and to Ath in April, in the middle of which month he was drafted into the first battalion of his regiment, commanded by Sir John Colborne (afterwards first baron Seaton) [q. v.]. During the battle of Waterloo Shaw was on baggage-guard duty at Brussels. He took part in the march to Paris and occupation of that city.

In March 1816 Shaw joined the second battalion of his regiment at Canterbury, and on its disbandment in July he was placed upon half-pay. After spending six months in Scotland, Shaw travelled in Holland in 1817. In July he was brought back to full pay in the 90th regiment. Obtaining leave of absence, he made a tour in the Hartz mountains, and in September entered as a student in the military department of the Carolinum College at Brunswick to improve his qualifications for a military career. He left Brunswick in January 1818 for Berlin to see something of the Prussian army, and, after a tour in Prussia, joined the 90th regiment at Plymouth on 10 March 1818. From Plymouth the regiment went to Chatham, and, on a reduction of the army taking place shortly after, Shaw again found himself on half-pay.

After attending a course of lectures at the Edinburgh University, he accepted an offer of partnership in an old-established wine business in Leith. He became captain and commander of the volunteer corps of Leith sharpshooters, and brought them into a high state of efficiency. On the disbandment of this corps Shaw was presented by its members, on 19 July 1822, with a handsome piece of plate. He established the first military club in Edinburgh, called the Caledonian

United Service Club, for which he acted as honorary secretary until 1830. In that year, finding that he had no taste for mercantile pursuits, he disposed of his business and travelled on the continent. Shaw returned to England in September 1831.

In November, after some negotiations, he was appointed captain of a light company of marines in the liberating army of Portugal against Don Miguel. He embarked with recruits on 15 Dec., joined the fleet of Admiral (afterwards Sir) George Sartorius [q. v.] at Belleisle, arrived at the rendezvous at Terceira in the Azores towards the end of February 1832, and in May proceeded to Fayal and St. Michael's. In June the expedition left the Azores for Portugal and disembarked on the morning of 6 July at Mindella, about ten miles from Oporto, which city was entered the same afternoon, the Miguelites having evacuated it.

Shaw, who in August was made a major of one of the battalions of British volunteers, saw a good deal of fighting around Oporto, and was in every action and sortie during the siege of the city by Dom Miguel. He was twice wounded in the attack on his position on 29 Sept., when after a severe fight the Miguelites were repulsed. He was also severely wounded in the sortie of 17 Nov. He was made a knight of the Tower and Sword of Portugal.

In 1833 he commanded the Scottish contingent at Lordello, an outpost of the defences of Oporto. In July 1833 he was appointed colonel and given the command of an English battalion. He took part at the head of his battalion in the repulse of Bourmont's attack on 25 July. At the end of September he embarked with his battalion for Lisbon, landing at St. Martinho and marching thence to Torres Vedras to operate on the rear of the Miguelite army on its withdrawal from the attack on Lisbon. Shaw and his battalion did a great deal of marching during the next eight months, but not much fighting. On 26 May 1834, two days after Shaw entered Estremoz, the war ended.

On 1 June Shaw marched to Lisbon in command of a brigade of 2,500 men, which he there handed over to a Portuguese officer. From this time to February 1835 Shaw's time was mainly occupied in attempts to effect a pecuniary settlement between the officers and men of the British contingent under his command and the Portuguese government in accordance with the latter's engagement, but his efforts were only partially successful. Shaw left Portugal in June and arrived at Falmouth on 12 July 1835.

He did not remain long idle. On 17 July he was gazetted a brigadier-general to command a Scottish brigade of the auxiliary legion then being raised in England by Sir George de Lacy Evans [q. v.] for service in Spain against the Carlists, and at once went to Glasgow to assist in raising recruits. He went to Spain in September, landing on the 10th at Santander and marching with some sixteen hundred men, whom he brought out with him, to Portugalette. Here he was disappointed to find that his rank would only be that of colonel in command of a brigade of two regiments. In February 1836 he was given command of a brigade of three fine Irish regiments, but not the rank of brigadier-general. Until April 1836 he was quartered principally at Vittoria or in its neighbourhood. On 13 April he marched for San Sebastian, embarking at Santander and arriving on the 24th at San Sebastian, which was then besieged by Don Carlos. On 5 May an attack was made on the Carlist position on the heights above San Sebastian, and after a protracted fight the day was won. Shaw was struck by a spent ball, and another struck his watch. He was now made a brigadier-general and decorated with the third class of the order of San Fernando. On 31 May Shaw repulsed an attack on his lines with great success. At the end of August, owing to a misunderstanding with Evans, Shaw sent in his resignation, which Evans accepted, regretting that the legion thereby lost the services of so efficient, gallant, and zealous an officer.

Shaw arrived in England at the end of September 1836, and for a time resided at Richmond, Surrey. In September 1839 he was appointed chief commissioner of police at Manchester, a post which he held until September 1842. During the latter part of his life he lived at Homburg-von-der-Hohe, where he died in February 1871, and was buried with military honours.

Shaw married, in 1841, Louisa Hannah, only daughter of Major Martin Curry of the 67th regiment, by whom he had a son Charles Martin, who with his mother survived him. Shaw published his rambling and egotistical Personal Memoirs and Correspondence. . . . Comprising a Narrative of the War for Constitutional Liberty in Portugal and in Spain from its Commencement in 1831 to the Dissolution of the British Legion in 1837; 2 vols. 8vo, London, 1837.

[Times, 28 Feb. 1871; Annual Register, 1871; Shaw's Personal Memoirs, 1837; Badcock's Journal in Spain and Portugal, 1832-4; Bacon's Six Years in Biscay, 1830-7; Duncan's English in Spain, 1834-40; A Concise Review of the Campaigns of the British Legion in Spain, by Colonel J. H. Humfrey, with plan, London, 8vo, 1838.] R. H. V.

SHAW, CUTHBERT (1739-1771), poet, the son of a shoemaker of the same name, was born at Ravensworth, near Richmond in Yorkshire, early in 1739. A younger brother, John, was baptised at the parish church of Kirby Hill on 6 Sept. 1741. After schooling at Kirby Hill and Scorton, both near Richmond, he proceeded usher, first at Scorton and then at Darlington grammar school. There he published his first poem, 'Liberty,' inscribed to the Earl of Darlington (1756, 4to). Meeting with scant appreciation in Yorkshire, he joined a company of comedians in the eastern counties, and was in 1760 at Bury St. Edmunds, where he published, under the pseudonym of W. Seymour, 'Odes on the Four Seasons.' In 1760, under the name of Smith, he appeared in Foote's comedy of 'The Minor,' but he had nothing to recommend him as an actor save his good looks, which were prematurely dulled by his excesses. On 19 Oct. 1761 he was Osman in 'Zara' at Covent Garden, and on 14 May 1762 Pierre in 'Venice Preserved,' for his own benefit. This seems to have been his last appearance on the stage. He was attracted to satire by the success of Churchill, whom he assailed with vigour, along with Lloyd, Colman, and Shirley, in 'The Four Farthing Candles' (London, 1762, 4to); this was followed by his more ambitious 'The Race. By Mercurius Spur, esq.' (1768, 4to), in which the living poets are made to contend for pre-eminence in fame by running. The portrait of Johnson in this poem is the best thing that Shaw wrote (republished in 'The Repository,' 1790, ii. 227; and quoted in Boswell's 'Johnson,' ed. Hill, ii. 31). Shaw now descended to puff a quack medicine, the 'Beaume de Vie,' in the proprietorship of which he was made a partner. On this he married, and was next, for a short time, tutor to the young Philip Stanhope (afterwards fifth earl of Chesterfield) in succession to the notorious Dr. William Dodd [q. v.]. His young wife died in 1768, and he published a 'Monody to the Memory of a Young Lady who died in Childhood,' with a poetical dedication to Lord Lyttelton, which caught the taste of the day, and of which a fourth edition appeared (London, 1779, 4to). Next year he found utterance in 'Corruption, a Satire,' inscribed to Richard Grenville, earl Temple, and subsequently (1770) in 'An Elegy on the Death of Charles Yorke, the Lord Chancellor,' which was generally suspected to have been suppressed on the family paying a sum of money to the author.

'It is to be feared,' says his biographer, 'that the morals of the author would not discountenance the opinion.' During the last years of his life he contributed much to 'The Freeholder's Magazine' and other periodicals, showing some gift for caustic annotation upon contemporary personalities and events. He died, 'overwhelmed with complicated distress,' at his house in Titchfield Street, Oxford Market, on 1 Sept. 1771. A selection of his work was printed in Anderson's 'British Poets' (1794, xi. 557), and also in Park's 'British Poets' (1808, xxxiii.), Whittingham's 'British Poets' (1822, lxiv. 47, with memoir by R. A. Davenport), and Sandford's 'British Poets' (1822, xxxi. 233).

[All that seems known of Shaw was communicated by an anonymous writer to the European Magazine, 1786, i. 14; cf. Gent. Mag. 1771, 456; Chalmers's Biogr. Dict.; Boswell's Life of Johnson, ed. Hill, iii. 140 n.; Pearce's Collection of Poems, ii. 219; Allibone's Dict.; Brit. Mus. Cat.] T. S.

SHAW, DUNCAN (1725-1795), Scottish divine, son of Lachlan Shaw [q. v.], minister of the parish church, Elgin, was born at Cawdor in 1725. He was educated at the Elgin Academy, and afterwards at King's College, Aberdeen, where he graduated in 1747. Continuing his theological studies, under a bursary won at Aberdeen, he went to Edinburgh University in 1749, and was licensed to preach three years later. In 1753 he was appointed minister to the parish of Rafford, Elginshire. There he remained for thirty years, until, in November 1783, he went to Aberdeen, as third of the ministers attached to the parish church. He filled this place until his death, on 23 June 1795. In 1774 Marischal College, Aberdeen, conferred upon him the title of doctor of divinity, and in 1786 the general assembly of the church elected him moderator. He married, in 1754, Jean, daughter of George Gordon, minister of Alves, Elgin, and she survived him one year. By her he had three sons and four daughters.

Shaw was 'a sensible and learned man' (NICHOLS, Lit. Illustr. iv. 823), and it was largely owing to his interest that Alexander Adam [q. v.] was able to rise from a Rafford croft to the rectorship of the high school, Edinburgh. His learning was in historical theology, and his chief works were: 1. 'A Comparative View of the Several Methods of promoting Religious Instruction, from the earliest down to the Present Time,' London, 1776, 2 vols. 2. 'The Philosophy and History of Judaism,' Edinburgh, 1787, a defence of the Mosaic system against Hume. 3. 'The Centurion,' Edinburgh, 1793.

[Hew Scott's Fasts, iii. 187, 472; New Statistical Account (Elginshire), p. 245; Stevenson's Hist. of the High School of Edinburgh, p. 109.] J. R. M.

SHAW or SHAA, SIR EDMUND (d. 1487?), lord mayor of London, was the son of John Shaa of Dunkerfield in Cheshire. He was a wealthy goldsmith and prominent member of the Goldsmiths' Company, of which he served the office of master. He was elected sheriff in 1474, and on his presentation the members of his company escorted him to Westminster (HERBERT, Twelve Great Livery Companies, ii. 219). Shaa became alderman, and in 1485 migrated to the ward of Cheap, on the death of Sir Thomas Hill through the 'sweating sickness.' He was elected mayor in 1482, and towards the close of his mayoralty he took an active part in influencing the succession to the crown on the death of Edward IV. Shaa probably had financial dealings with the crown, and his intimacy with Edward IV appears from a bequest in his will for an obit for the soul of that 'excellent prince' and his sister, the Duchess of Exeter. He became nevertheless a strong supporter of Richard III, who made him a privy councillor, and whose claims to the throne he and his brother (see below) were doubtless largely instrumental in inducing the citizens to adopt. Shaa appears to have resided in Foster Lane, where, and in the neighbouring West Chepe, the goldsmiths kept their shops. He possessed, and probably occupied, the great mansion, with its adjoining tenements, in Foster Lane, in which Sir Bartholomew Reid had lived (ib. ii. 253).

He died about 1487, and was buried in the church of St. Thomas of Acon, where he founded a chantry for the souls of his wife Juliana (who died in 1493), his son Hugh, and others (SHARPE, Calendar of Huston's Wills, ii. 612). This trust, with many singular injunctions attached, he placed under the charge of the Mercers' Company (WATNEY, Account of the Hospital of St. Thomas of Acon, pp. 51-3). His will, dated 20 March 1487, was proved in the P. C. C. (Milles 12). Full effect was given to his intentions under the will of Stephen Kelk, goldsmith, who administered Shaa's bequest under an agreement with his executors (WATNEY, p. 53; PRIDEAUX, Goldsmiths' Company, i. 33-4). One of these executors, John Shaa, goldsmith, may have been the Sir John Shaa (knighted on Bosworth Field and made a banneret by Henry VII) who was lord mayor in 1501, or a near relative. By another will, not enrolled, Shaa left four hundred marks for rebuilding Cripplegate, which was carried out by his executors in 1491. He also left property in charge of the Goldsmiths' Company, producing an annual sum of 177., to found a school 'for all boys of the town of Stockport and its neighbourhood,' in which place his parents were buried. This school was considerably developed and its advantages extended by the Goldsmiths' Company (HERBERT, ii. 252-3). Shaw also directed by his will that sixteen gold rings should be made as amulets or charms against disease, chiefly cramp. One of these rings, found in 1895 during excavations in Daubeney Road, Hackney, is now in the British Museum. On the outside are figures of the crucifixion, the Madonna, and St. John, with a mystical inscription in English; the inside contains another mystical inscription in Latin.

The lord mayor's brother, RALEIGH or JOHN SHAW (d. 1484), styled John by More and Holinshed, and Raffe by Hall and Fabyan, may without much doubt be identified with Ralph Shaw, S. T. B., who was appointed prebendary of Cadington Minor in the diocese of London on 14 March 1476-7, and was esteemed a man of learning and ability. He was chosen by the Protector (afterwards Richard III) to preach a sermon at St. Paul's Cross on 23 June 1483, when he impugned the validity of Edward IV's marriage with Elizabeth Woodville, and even asserted, according to More, that Edward IV and his brother Clarence were bastards. Fabyan states that he 'lived in little prosperity afterwards,' and died before 21 Aug. 1484 (GAIRDNER, Life of Richard III, 1878, pp. 100-4; FABYAN, Chronicle, 1811, p. 669; MORE, Life of Richard III, ed. Lumby, pp. 57, 70; HOLINSHED, Chronicles, ed. Hooker, iii. 725, 729; HALL, Chronicle, 1809, p. 365; LE NEVE, Fasti Ecclesie Anglicane, ii. 372).

[Orridge's Citizens of London and their Rulers, pp. 116-20; Sharpe's London and the Kingdom, i. 320-2; Price's Historical Account of the Guildhall, p. 186; Watney's Hospital of St. Thomas of Acon, pp. 51-3; Sharpe's Calendar of Husting Wills, ii. 612-17; Prideaux's Memorials of the Goldsmiths' Company, 1896, passim; Notes and Queries, 8th ser. xii. 345.] C. W.-H.

SHAW, SIR FREDERICK (1799-1876), Irish politician, born at Bushy Park, co. Dublin, on 11 Dec. 1799, was second son of Sir Robert Shaw, bart., by his wife Maria, daughter and heiress of Abraham Wilkinson of Bushy Park. The father, a Dublin banker, sat in the Grattan parliament (1793-1800) for Bannow Borough, co. Wexford, voting against the union, and was afterwards for twenty-two years (1804-26) member for Dublin city in the imperial parliament. He also served the office of lord mayor of Dublin, and was created a baronet in 1821.

Frederick, the second son, entered Trinity College, Dublin, in 1816, but shortly afterwards removed to Brasenose College, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1819. In 1822 he was called to the Irish bar and quickly attained a considerable practice. In 1826 he was appointed recorder of Dundalk, an office which he vacated two years later on his nomination to the recordership of Dublin.

His father's influence, combined with his own abilities, soon led to his selection as one of the tory candidates for the representation of Dublin. In 1830 he successfully contested the city, defeating Henry Grattan's son. At the general election of 1831 he was unsuccessful, but was awarded the seat on petition, and held it for the brief remainder of the unreformed parliament. Each of his elections for the unreformed constituency of Dublin cost him 10,000l. At the election which followed the Reform Act he was returned in conjunction with Serjeant (afterwards Chief-justice) Lefroy for the university of Dublin; and between 1830 and his retirement from parliament in 1848 he was four times re-elected for the same constituency.

In the House of Commons Shaw rapidly acquired a reputation. Possessing debating talents of a high order, he became the recognised leader of the Irish conservatives, and was regarded as the most capable opponent of O'Connell, though he did not take the extreme tory view of any question, and had been a supporter of catholic emancipation before that measure was passed. His most considerable parliamentary achievement was in the debate on the charges brought by O'Connell against Sir William Cusack Smith [q. v.], one of the Irish judges. O'Connell had on 13 Feb. 1834 carried by a majority of ninety-three a motion for the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the conduct of Baron Smith in introducing political topics in his judicial charges. A week later a motion to rescind this resolution was carried, notwithstanding ministerial opposition, as a result mainly of Shaw's eloquent vindication of the accused judge.

On the accession to office of Sir Robert Peel in 1834 Shaw declined on professional grounds all preferment beyond a seat in the Irish privy council. During this short administration he was, however, the chief adviser of Lord Haddington's Irish government, which was called by opponents the Shaw viceroyalty (OWEN MADDY, Ireland and its Rulers, ii. 245-65). On the return of the whigs to office Shaw became one of Peel's most active colleagues in opposition, being in the opinion of Mr. Gladstone 'a ready, bold, and vigorous debater, able to hold his own against whatever antagonist, and possessed as I think of the entire confidence of Sir Robert Peel' (Letter from Mr. Gladstone, 14 March 1898). He took an active but not extreme part in the opposition to Lord John Russell's Municipal Corporations Bill of 1835. Although he had entered parliament as the accredited representative of conservative and protestant principles, Shaw's opinion and conduct had by 1847 become too liberal for some of his old supporters, and at the elections in that year he only retained his seat for the university after a very severe contest with Sir Joseph Napier [q. v.], afterwards lord chancellor.

In 1848 broken health obliged him to resign his seat and retire from political life. On the death of his elder brother Robert, unmarried, on 19 Feb. 1869, he succeeded to the baronetcy. Early in 1876 he resigned his office of recorder of Dublin, receiving an address from the bar. He had been made a bencher of the King's Inns in 1835. He died on 30 June 1876. Shaw married in his twentieth year, on 16 March 1819, Thomasine Emily (d. 1859), daughter of the Hon. George Jocelyn, and granddaughter of Robert, first earl of Roden, and left issue five sons and three daughters.

[O'Connell's Corresp. ii. 270, 302, 399; Shiel's Sketches, ii. 332; Thomas Lefroy's Memoir of Chief Justice Lefroy, 1871; Burke's Peerage; private information.] C. L. F.

SHAW, GEORGE (1751-1813), naturalist, the younger of two sons of Timothy Shaw, was born on 10 Dec. 1751 at Bierton, Buckinghamshire, where his father was vicar. He was educated at home by his father till 1765, when he entered Magdalen Hall, Oxford. He graduated B.A. on 16 May 1769, and M.A. on 16 May 1772. He was ordained deacon in 1774 at Buckden, and performed duty at Stoke and Buckland, chapels-of-ease to Bierton.

His love for natural history, which showed itself in infancy, led him to abandon the church as a profession and he went to Edinburgh to study medicine for three years. Returning to Oxford, he was appointed deputy botanical lecturer. On 17 Oct. 1787 he was admitted to the degrees of bachelor and doctor of medicine (being then a member of Magdalen College), and the same year he set up in practice in London.

In 1788 he took part in founding the Linnean Society of London, and became one of its vice-presidents. In the following year he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society. In 1791 he was appointed assistant-keeper of the natural history section of the British Museum, and was made keeper in 1807, on the death of Dr. Edward Whittaker Gray [q. v.] He retained the post till his death, in the residence attached to the museum, on 22 July 1813.

Shaw had a tenacious memory, wrote Latin with facility, elegance, and purity, and sometimes lapsed into poetry. He delivered lectures on zoology at the Royal Institution in 1806 and 1807, and repeated them at the Surrey Institution in 1809. He was an indefatigable worker, and in his 'Philosophical Transactions Abridged' (15 vols. 4to, London, 1809) dealt with all the papers on natural history, nearly fifteen hundred in number, inserting the Linnean names of the species and adding references to later works.

He was author of: 1. 'Speculum Linnæanum' (describing eight coloured plates of James Sowerby [q. v.]), 4to, London, 1790. 2. 'Museum Leverianum,' 2 pts. 4to, London, 1792-96. 3. 'Zoology of New Holland,' vol. i. (being descriptions of plates by J. Sowerby), 4to, London, 1794. 4. 'Cimelia Physica' (of which he wrote the descriptions to the series of plates by J. F. Miller), fol. London, 1796. 5. 'General Zoology,' vols. i.-viii. 8vo, London, 1800-1812; the remainder, vols. ix.-xiv. (birds), was by James Francis Stephens [q. v.] 6. 'The Naturalists' Miscellany' (also entitled 'Vivarium Naturæ'), 24 vols., with coloured plates by Frederick P. Nodder [q. v.] (and afterwards E. and R. P. Nodder), 4to, London, 1789-1813 (this work was subsequently continued by William Elford Leach [q. v.] and Nodder as the 'Zoological Miscellany').

Shaw also wrote an account of the animals for J. White's 'Journal of a Voyage to New South Wales' (4to, 1790), and the descriptions of the plates in part ii. of 'Select Specimens of British Plants,' edited by S. Freeman (fol. 1797), as well as the descriptions of plates xvi.-xviii in James Sowerby's 'English Botany' (Mag. Nat. Hist. i. 304). Seven papers by him on zoological subjects appeared in the 'Transactions' of the Linnean Society of London between 1791 and 1800.

An engraved portrait by Holl, from a painting by Russell, is included in Thornton's 'New Illustrations of the Sexual System of Linnæus.'

[Gent. Mag. 1813, ii. 290-2; Brit. Mus. Cat.; Royal Soc. Cat.] B. B. W.

SHAW, HENRY (1800-1873), architectural draughtsman, engraver, illuminator, and antiquary, was born in London on 4 July 1800. Having early developed a talent for drawing, he was employed by John Britton to assist him in his 'Cathedral Antiquities of England,' and supplied most of the illustrations of Wells Cathedral and many of that of Gloucester. In 1828 he published 'A Series of Details of Gothic Architecture,' and in 1829, with plates drawn and engraved by himself, 'The History and Antiquities of the Chapel at Luton Park,' an exquisite specimen of the most florid style of Gothic architecture, destroyed by fire in 1843. These were followed by other antiquarian works of great interest, such as 'Illuminated Ornaments of the Middle Ages, selected from Manuscript and early printed Books,' with descriptive text by Sir Frederic Madden, 1833; 'Examples of Ornamental Metal Work,' 1836; 'Specimens of Ancient Furniture,' with descriptions by Sir Samuel Rush Meyrick [q. v.], 1836; 'Ancient Plate and Furniture from the Colleges of Oxford and the Ashmolean Museum,' also with descriptive text by Sir S. R. Meyrick, 1837; 'Specimens of the Details of Elizabethan Architecture,' with descriptions by Thomas Moule, 1839; 'The Encyclopedia of Ornament,' 1842; 'Dresses and Decorations of the Middle Ages,' 1843; 'The Fishmongers' Pageant, on Lord Mayor's Day, 1616: Chrysanaleia, the Golden Fishing, devised by Anthony Munday,' with introduction by John Gough Nichols, 1844; 'Alphabets, Numerals, and Devices of the Middle Ages,' 1845; 'Decorative Arts, ecclesiastical and civil, of the Middle Ages,' 1851; 'The Hand Book of Mediæval Alphabets and Devices,' 1853; 'The Arms of the Colleges of Oxford,' 1855; 'Specimens of Tile Pavements,' 1858; and 'Handbook of the Art of Illumination as practised during the Middle Ages,' 1866. Most of these are rendered of permanent value by the knowledge and taste displayed in the selection of the examples by which they are illustrated, and by the careful drawing and colouring of the plates.

Shaw was elected a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries in 1833, and contributed a few papers to its 'Proceedings,' of which the most important was an 'Account of the Remains of a Tile Pavement recently found within the precincts of Chertsey Abbey, Surrey' (Proceedings, 1856, iii. 269-77). He edited in 1848 a reproduction of Walter Gidde's 'Booke of sundry Draughtes principally serving for Glaziers, and not impertinent for Plasterers and Gardeners,' originally published in 1615. He also designed or adapted, and drew on the wood, the initial letters and all the decorative portions of Longman's edition of the New Testament, published in 1864. He likewise executed some excellent work in the form of illuminated addresses and testimonials.

Shaw died at Broxbourne, Hertfordshire, on 12 June 1873. His copy of 'Illuminated Ornament,' highly finished by his own hand, is in the library of the British Museum.

[Reidgrave's Dictionary of Artists, 1878; Athenæum, 1873, i. 798; Lowndes's Bibliographer's Manual, ed. Bohn, iv. 2371; Brit. Mus. Cat.]
R. E. G.

SHAW, SIR JAMES (1761-1843), 1st lord mayor of London, son of John Shaw, an Ayrshire farmer, whose ancestors had occupied the property of Mosshead for three centuries, and of Helen, daughter of David Sellars of the Mains, Craigie, Ayrshire, was born at Mosshead in the parish of Riccarton in 1761. On his father's death, about five years later, the family moved to Kilmarnock, where James Shaw was educated at the grammar school. When seventeen years old he went to America to join his brother David, who held a position in the commissariat service, and by his interest was placed in the commercial house of Messrs. George and Samuel Douglass at New York. Three years later he returned to Britain, and was made a junior member of the firm in London. In 1798 he was elected alderman for the ward of Portsoken, in 1803 became sheriff of London and Middlesex, and in 1805 was chosen lord mayor. He distinguished himself in this office by reviving the right of the city to precedence on public occasions, and exercised his privileges at the funeral of Lord Nelson, when many of the royal family took part in the procession.

From 1806 to 1818 Shaw sat in parliament as member for the city of London as an independent tory (Official Returns of Members of Parliament, ii. 233, 247, 261). Having been created a baronet in September 1809, Sir James continued an alderman till 1831, when he was elected chamberlain of London. In this position he was threatened with a serious misfortune. He inadvertently invested 40,000*l.* held by him as banker to the corporation in the spurious exchequer bills with which the market at that time was flooded. On discovering his error he made immediate preparations to sacrifice almost his entire private fortune to make good the loss. A government commission, however, completely exonerated him, and he was repaid the full amount. In May 1843 he resigned the office of chamberlain, and on 22 Oct. of the same year he died, unmarried, at his house in America Square.

Sir James was peculiarly zealous in aiding his fellow-countrymen. Among other kindnesses he succeeded in procuring a provision for the widow of Robert Burns and commissions for her sons. In 1848 a statue of him, by Fillans, was erected at the Kilmarnock Cross. A portrait also, by James Tannock, was presented to the borough.

The baronetcy, by a special patent granted in 1813, descended to his sister's son, John MacGee, who took the name of Shaw. On his death, without issue, in November 1868, it became extinct.

[Times, 25 Oct. 1843; Gent. Mag. 1843, ii. 654; McKay's Hist. of Kilmarnock, p. 230; Lodge's Peerage and Baronetage, 1859, p. 816.]
E. I. C.

SHAW, JOHN (1559-1625), divine, born in Westmoreland in 1559, matriculated from Queen's College, Oxford, on 17 Nov. 1581, and graduated B.A. on 29 Feb. 1583-4. He was instituted vicar of Woking, Surrey, on 11 Sept. 1588, was deprived in 1596 for nonconformity, but appears from a distich formerly to be seen in a window of the church to have considered himself still vicar, nearly thirty years later. He lived at Woking until his death in 1625, and was buried there on 15 Sept. He was married, and left issue two sons, John and Tobias (see FOSTER, Alumni Oxon. 1500-1714, p. 1351).

Wood says he was 'esteemed by some for his preaching, and by others for his verses.' The latter were published in 'The Blessedness of Marie, the Mother of Jesus,' London, 1618, 8vo; 2nd edit. 1618, 12mo, and in 'Biblia Symmyla . . . alphabetice distichis comprehensa,' 1621, 8vo; 2nd edit. 1623, 8vo. This has gratulatory verses by D. Featley, Thomas Goad, and Stephen Denison. The work was translated into English by Shaw's schoolfellow, Simon Wastell [q. v.], and published, London, 1623, 12mo, under the title, 'A true Christian's Daily Delight': it was reprinted in 1688 under the title 'The Divine Art of Memory.'

[Wood's Athenae Oxon. ii. 351; Manning and Bray's Hist. and Antiq. of Surrey, i. 138, 310, 144 n.; Aubrey's Antiq. of Surrey, iii. 218; Foster's Alumni, 1500-1714, p. 1340.] C. F. S.

SHAW or SHAWE, JOHN (1608-1672), puritan divine, only child of John Shawe (d. December 1634, aged 63) by his second wife, was born at Sick-House in the chapelry of Bradfield, parish of Ecclesfield, West Riding of Yorkshire, on 28 June 1608. His mother was Emot, daughter of Nicholas Stead of Onesacre in the same chapelry. In 1623 he was admitted pensioner at Christ's College, Cambridge, his tutor being William Chappell [q. v.]. Two sermons by Thomas Weld [q. v.], at a village near Cambridge, made him a puritan before he had taken his degree. Driven from Cambridge by the plague in 1629, he was ordained deacon and priest (28 Dec.) by Thomas Dove [q. v.], bishop of Peterborough. He commenced M.A. in 1630. His first charge was a lectureship in the then chapelry of Brampton, Derbyshire, hitherto supplied only by a 'reader.' His diocesan Thomas Morton (1564-1659), then bishop of Coventry and Lichfield, thought him young for a preaching license, and 'set himself to pose' Shawe in a scholastic examination. 'When he had done,' says Shawe, 'he gave me my hand full of money, and, laying his hand on my head said, "Your licence shall be this (without demanding any subscription of me), that you shall preach in any part of my diocese, when and where you will.' He remained at Brampton three years (1630-3), occasionally visiting London, where his preaching attracted 'some merchants in the city that were natives of Devonshire.' By their means, Shawe, who was now married, and held the post of chaplain to Philip Herbert, earl of Montgomery and fourth earl of Pembroke [q. v.], was transferred in 1633 to a lectureship to be maintained by London puritans for a term of three years at Chumleigh, Devonshire. His term was not quite expired when the lectureship was suppressed. It is probable that the suppression was due to Laud's interference with the evangelising schemes of the city merchants, but the statement connecting it with the judgment of the court of exchequer (13 Feb. 1638) against the feoffees for buying up impropriations cannot be true [see GOUGE, WILLIAM, D.D.]. In 1636 Shawe retired to Sick-House, of which he had become possessed on his father's death. At the instance of Vaux, the lord mayor of York, he was soon appointed lecturer at Allhallows-on-the-Pavement, York. Having preached his first sermon there, he was summoned by the archbishop, Richard Neile [q. v.], who regarded Vaux as his enemy, but moderated his tone on learning that Shawe was Pembroke's chaplain.

On 17 April 1639 Shawe was instituted to the vicarage of Rotherham on Pembroke's presentation, and the earl took him to Berwick as his chaplain. At the pacification of Berwick (28 May) Shawe made the acquaintance of Alexander Henderson (1584?-1646) [q. v.], and improved it in the following year at Ripon, where he acted (October 1640) as chaplain to the English commissioners. He acted as chaplain at Doncaster to Henry Rich, earl of Holland [q. v.], in 1641, when Holland was engaged in disbanding the army raised against the Scots. Shawe's ministry at Rotherham was disturbed by the outbreak of the civil war. On Sunday, 22 Jan. 1643, while Shawe was in the midst of his sermon, Rotherham was attacked by an armed force. Shawe with his 'man, Robert Gee, lay hid in the etesple of the church.' He fled to Hull, but, having preached there once, he was excluded by the governor, Sir John Hotham [q. v.], as an extreme man. Subsequently he preached before Ferdinando Fairfax, second baron Fairfax [q. v.], at Selby. Returning to Rotherham, he was proclaimed a traitor and fined a thousand marks. On the taking of the town (4 May 1648) his wife was imprisoned, but Shawe, after hiding in cellars for three weeks, escaped to Manchester. Here he preached every Friday without pay. He accepted from Sir William Brereton (1604-1661) [q. v.] the rectory of Lymm, Cheshire, but continued to reside in Manchester. He was invited (April 1644) to Cartmel, Lancashire, on a preaching mission, and tells strange stories of the ignorance of the district. On the approach of Rupert (June 1644), Shawe fled to Yorkshire. He was chaplain to the standing committee established after the surrender of York (16 July) for the government of the northern counties, preached in York minster at the taking of the 'league and covenant' (20 Sept. 1644), and was scribe to the 'assembly of ministers,' which met weekly in the chapter-house at York to assist Fairfax in the work of 'casting out ignorant and scandalous ministers.' All the records of this 'assembly' were kept by Shawe, and burned by him 'upon the turn of the times.' Fairfax gave him the rich rectory of Scrayingham, East Riding; he preached there but a short time, and accepted a call to Hull, lecturing first at the low church (St. Mary's), then at the high church (Holy Trinity), with a stipend from the corporation of 150*l.* and a house. He lectured on Wednesdays and Sundays, and preached to the garrison. It appears that he was a congregationalist in his ideas of church government, for his parishioners petitioned parliament about his gathering a particular church. In 1648 he was at Newcastle-on-Tyne, as chaplain of the parliamentary commissioners to Charles I. In 1651, through the interest of Sir William Strickland, he was appointed master of the Charter House at Hull with an income of 10*l.* During the protectorate he preached frequently at Whitehall and Hampton Court. Cromwell admired his preaching, and gave him an augmentation of 100*l.* a year. He once preached before Richard Cromwell at Whitehall.

When the Restoration came, Shawe was sworn a royal chaplain (25 July 1660). By the end of the year complaints of his serv-vices from the officers and garrison of Hull reached Charles II through Sheldon. Shawe was present at the coronation (23 April 1661). On 9 June Sir Edward Nicholls [q. v.] despatched a royal mandate (dated 8 June) inhibiting him from preaching at Holy Trinity, Hull. Shawe went up to London and was introduced to the king by Edward Montagu, second earl of Manchester [q. v.] Charles declined to remove the inhibition, but allowed him to retain his mastership, and promised to provide for him as his chaplain. Shawe then saw Sheldon, who explained that he was looked upon as a clerical leader in the north, and as 'no great friend to episcopacy or common prayer.' Shawe declared that he had never in his life said a word against either, but owned that 'if they had never come in, he would never have fetched them.' Returning to Hull, he preached every Sunday at the Charter House, and drew crowds, in spite of obstructions by this garrison. Finding the situation hopeless, the Uniformity Act being now passed (19 May 1662), he resigned the Charter House, closed his accounts with the corporation, whom he left nearly 1,000*l.* in his debt, and removed on 20 June to Rotherham. Here, till the act came into force (24 Aug.), he conducted services in the parish church alternately with the vicar, Luke Clayton (d. 1674).

Henceforth he preached only in private houses. His means were ample. Calamy notes his 'brave presence' and 'stupendious [sic] memory;' 'he had the Book of Martyrs' at his fingers' ends. He died on 19 April 1672, and was buried in Rotherham parish church, where a brass (now missing) bore a Latin inscription to his memory, describing him as a Barnabas and a Boanerges. He married, first, on 18 Dec. 1632, Dorothy Heathcote (d. 10 Dec. 1657) of Outthorpe Hall, Derbyshire, by whom he had six daughters, and a son who died in infancy; secondly, on 19 Dec. 1659, Margaret, daughter of John Stillington of Kelfield, a lady of high family, by whom he had one daughter, and a son John, born 9 Feb. 1663, died unmarried December 1682.

He published, besides quarto sermons, 'Mistress Shawe's Tomb-stone, or the Saint's Remains,' &c. [June] 1658, 8vo, a memoir of his first wife. His autobiography, written for his son, was edited by John Broadley (from a transcript by Ralph Thoresby) as 'Memoire of the Life of John Shawe,' &c., Hull, 1824, 12mo, re-edited for the Surtees Society, 1875; and again re-edited by the Rev. J. R. Boyle, Hull, 1882, 4to. A manuscript volume of his sermons was (1868) in the vestry library of Park Street chapel, Hull.

[Memoirs, ed. Boyle, 1882; Shaw's publications; Calamy's Abridgment, 1702, p. 451; Calamy's Account, 1713, pp. 823 sq. (chiefly condensed from the manuscript autobiography); Hunter's Oliver Heywood, 1842, p. 316; Miall's Congregationalism in Yorkshire, 1888, pp. 290 sq.; Blazeby's An Old Vicar of Rotherham, [1894]; information from Rev. W. Blazeby, Rotherham, and Mr. Donald Wilson, Hull.] A. G.

SHAW, JOHN (1614-1689), divine, son of a minister, was born at Bedlington, Durham, in 1614, and matriculated at Queen's College, Oxford, on 21 Nov. 1628, but removed to Brasenose on 2 April 1629. On graduating B.A., 24 March 1631-2, he returned to the north, and was ordained by the bishop of Durham. He seems to have been vicar of Alnham, Northumberland, from 1636, and in 1645 was presented to Whalton rectory in the same county, but was never admitted because of his strong royalist views. Probably he went abroad for a time; but he afterwards received the rectory of Bolton in Craven, which Wood says 'he was permitted to keep because it was only worth 50l. a year.' Walker says he was imprisoned for four years during the Commonwealth. After the Restoration, Shaw was admitted to Whalton by John Cosin [q. v.], the new bishop of Durham, and on 27 Aug. 1662 he was appointed lecturer at St. John's Church, Newcastle-on-Tyne, and afternoon lecturer at All Saints' in the same town. The corporation of Newcastle printed some of his writings against popery at their own expense. Shaw died at Newcastle on 22 May 1689. He was buried in St. John's Church.

Shaw's works, all of them rare, are: 1. 'The Portraiture of the Primitive Saints in their Actings and Sufferings, according to St. Paul's Canon,' Newcastle, 1652, 4to. 2. 'The Catalogue of the Hebrew Saints canonized by St. Paul further explained and applied,' Newcastle, 1659, 4to. 3. 'Origo Protestantium, or an Answer to a Popish manuscript,' by 'N.N.' (Bodleian Catalogue), London, 1677, 4to. 4. 'No Reformation of the Established Reformation,' London, 1685, 8vo.

[Works above named; Mackenzie's Hist. of Newcastle, i. 347, 355; Brand's Hist. of Newcastle, i. 113, 118, 119, 387; Walker's Sufferings, ii. 368; Whitaker's Hist. of Craven, ed. Morant, p. 131; Foster's Alumni, 1500-1714; Kennett's Register, pp. 544, 918; Wood's Athenae Oxon. iv. 256, and Fasti, i. 459; Mackenzie's View of Northumberland, p. 302.] O. F. S.

SHAW, JOHN (1792-1827), surgeon and anatomist, born 2 April 1792, was the son of Charles Shaw, clerk of the county of Ayr, and brother of Alexander Shaw [q. v.], of Sir Charles Shaw [q. v.], and of Patrick Shaw

[q. v.] At the age of fifteen he was sent to London to be a pupil of Charles (afterwards Sir Charles) Bell [q. v.], who became his brother-in-law. The connection thus formed lasted until Shaw's death. At the Great Windmill Street school he acted as superintendent of the dissecting-room, and on the death of Wilson became co-lecturer with Bell. The greater part of the experiments which led to Bell's discoveries on the nervous system were performed by Shaw, and he also took a large share in the work of forming Bell's anatomical museum. Bell's 'Letters' show in what affectionate regard he held him. Shaw accompanied Bell to Brussels immediately after Waterloo to study the effect of gunshot wounds. In 1831 he went to Paris to explain to the profession there Bell's methods of investigating the functions of the nervous system. In 1825 he was by a large majority elected surgeon to the Middlesex Hospital. This office he held until his death from fever on 19 July 1827. Bell wrote to his friend John Richardson on 21 July 1827: 'I have lost my dear and best friend, John Shaw. He was the happiest creature in his death, laughing to see my exertions to relieve him.'

Shaw accomplished much good work during a short life. His principal works are: 1. 'A Manual of Anatomy,' 1821; 2nd edit. 1822; 3rd edit. 2 vols. 1822. This book was republished in America, and was also translated into German; it was mainly intended for medical students, and was founded on the demonstrations given by Shaw at Great Windmill Street. 2. 'On the Effects on the Human Countenance of Paralysis of the Facial Nerves,' 1822. 3. 'On the Nature and Treatment of the Distortions to which the Spine and the Bones of the Chest are subject,' 1823-4. This is illustrated by a fine series of plates, mostly engraved by Thomas Landseer; it is a book of considerable merit, and is quoted at the present day as an authority on orthopaedic surgery. In 1825 a supplement was issued, with the title 'Further Observations on the Lateral or Serpentine Curvature of the Spine.' Both the book itself and the supplement were translated into German. Shaw also edited the third edition of Bell's 'Diseases of the Urethra.' In the preface Bell pays a high tribute to Shaw's abilities as an anatomist.

[Med. Chir. Rev. new ser. 1827, vii. 581, Letters of Sir Charles Bell.] J. B. B.

SHAW, JOHN (1776-1832), architect, was born at Bexley, Kent, on 10 March 1776. He was articled to George Gwilt the elder [q. v.], and commenced practice in 1798. He built many country houses, including Clifden, Buckinghamshire; Blendon Hall, Kent; Rooks' Nest, Surrey; Ham Hall, Staffordshire; and Cresswell Hall, Northumberland. In 1819 he restored Newstead Abbey for Colonel Wildman, and designed the new church of St. Dunstan, Fleet Street, London, which was completed in 1833. In 1816 he was appointed architect and surveyor to Christ's Hospital, to which he made extensive additions. He was also architect to the Ramsgate harbour trust, and the clock-tower there, as well as the obelisk erected to commemorate the visit of George IV in 1821, was his work. He was largely engaged in the valuation of property in London for compensation, on account of the extensive street improvements effected in his time. Shaw was a fellow of the Royal and Linnean societies, of the Society of Antiquaries and the Institute of British Architects. He died suddenly at Ramsgate on 30 July 1832, and was buried at Bexley, leaving six sons and two daughters. His widow died in 1864. His seventh son, Thomas Budge Shaw, is noticed separately.

His son, JOHN SHAW (1803-1870), born in London on 17 May 1803, was a pupil of his father, whom he succeeded as architect to Christ's Hospital. He built Holy Trinity Church, Great New Street, Fetter Lane, 1838; the Royal Naval School at New Cross, 1844; and Wellington College, Sandhurst, 1855-9. Shaw was one of the official referees of metropolitan buildings from 1844 to 1855, when the duties of that office were transferred to the metropolitan board of works. He died on 9 July 1870, and was buried in Kensal Green cemetery.

[Dictionary of Architecture; Redgrave's Dictionary of Artists; information from John Hebb, esq.] F. M. O'D.

SHAW, JOSEPH (1671-1733), legal writer, son of John Shaw of London, was born in 1671. He matriculated from Trinity College, Oxford, on 10 June 1687, and in 1695 entered the Middle Temple. About 1700 he made a tour through Holland, Flanders, and part of France, and embodied his observations in a series of letters to Anthony Ashley Cooper, third earl of Shaftesbury [q. v.], whose friendship and patronage he enjoyed. The letters were published in 1709. They are full of interesting details of the state of those countries during the brief interval of peace which followed the treaty of Ryswick. In later life Shaw settled at Epsom in Surrey, and devoted himself to legal study. In 1728 he published 'The Practical Justice of the Peace,' which attained its sixth edition in 1756. Shortly before his death he published a companion volume entitled 'Parish Law,' dedicated to his personal friend, Sir J. F. Aland, justice of common pleas, which has remained the standard work on that subject. The latest edition was published in 1881. Shaw died at Clapham on 24 Oct. 1733, leaving a son Joseph, who afterwards resided at Epsom.

[Gent. Mag. 1733, p. 651; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1500-1714; Shaw's Letters to a Nobleman; Allibone's Dict., and for a singularly incorrect account which attributes his works to his grandson, Gent. Mag. 1806, ii. 672.] E. I. O.

SHAW, LACHLAN (1692-1777), Scottish divine, son of Donald Shaw, a Rothiemurcus farmer, was born in 1692, and educated at Ruthven and King's College, Aberdeen, where he graduated in 1711. After being schoolmaster at Abernethy, he went to the Edinburgh University to study theology, and was licensed to preach on 24 April 1716. That year he was appointed to the parish church, Kingussie; in 1719 he went to Cawdor, Nairnshire; and in 1734 he took the collegiate charge at Elgin. This he resigned in April 1774, and he died in Elgin on 23 Feb. 1777. He was twice married—first, to a daughter of Collector Stewart of Inverness, and, secondly, to Anne, daughter of Bailie Duncan Grant, Inverness, on 14 March 1727—and had, with other issue, Duncan Shaw [q. v.].

Shaw's reputation as an antiquary and scholar was not merely local. His knowledge of Gaelic was profound, and his information regarding the history of the parts of Scotland where he had lived was unique. His correspondents were numerous, and included members of the leading literary and scientific circles of his time. His 'History of the Province of Moray' remains a standard work. It was originally published in Edinburgh in 1775, and republished in Elgin in 1827. The last edition, brought up to date by J. F. S. Gordon, was issued in three volumes in London in 1882.

His other works are: 1. 'Description of Elgin and the Shire of Murray,' in Pennant's 'Tour,' London, 1774. 2. 'Continuation of Rose's Genealogy of the family of Kilravock' (Spalding Club), Aberdeen, 1843. He also edited with notes and additions the Rev. Dr. Macpherson's 'Critical Dissertations,' London, 1768.

[New Scott's Fasti, iii. 235, 249, 154.]

J. R. M.

SHAW, MARY (1814-1876), vocalist, daughter of John Postans, messman at the guard-room, St. James's Palace, was born in 1814. From September 1828 to June 1831

she was a student at the Royal Academy of Music, and afterwards became a pupil of Sir George Smart. She made her first appearance in public as a contralto singer in 1831. At the amateur musical festival at Exeter Hall in the November of that year she attracted attention, and in 1835 she was engaged at the concert of ancient music and at the York festival. About the end of the year she married Alfred Shaw, an artist. In 1836 she sang at the Norwich and Liverpool festivals, at the latter taking the contralto part of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' on its first performance in England. In 1837 she appeared at the Philharmonic and Sacred Harmonic societies, and at the Birmingham festival. After singing at the Gloucester festival in 1838 she took part in the Gewandhaus concerts at Leipzig under Mendelssohn's direction. In a letter to the directors of the Philharmonic Society, dated 19 Jan. 1839, Mendelssohn speaks of Clara Novello [q. v.] and Mrs. Shaw as 'the best concert singers we have had in this country for a long time.' She next appeared at La Scala in Milan on 17 Nov. 1839 in Verdi's opera 'Oberto.' In 1842 she returned to England, and took part in operatic music at Covent Garden with Adelaide Kemble. In 1843 she sang at the Sacred Harmonic Society and at the Birmingham festival. Soon afterwards her husband became insane, and her distress of mind deranged her vocal organs so that she was unable to sing in tune. For three or four years she resorted to teaching, only appearing in public at an annual benefit concert. Eventually she married a second husband, John Frederick Robinson, a country solicitor, and retired from the profession. She died on 9 Sept. 1876 at her husband's residence, Hadleigh Hall, Suffolk.

[Grove's Dictionary of Music, iii. 485; Men of the Reign, p. 806; Athenæum, 1876, ii. 411.]

E. I. G.

SHAW, PATRICK (1796-1872), legal writer, born at Ayr in 1796, was grandson of David Shaw, D.D., moderator of the general assembly in 1776, who is referred to by Burns in the 'Twa Herds' (Burns, Poetical Works, ed. Chambers, 1830, p. 56). His father was Charles Shaw, clerk of the county of Ayr. Alexander Shaw [q. v.], Sir Charles Shaw [q. v.], and John Shaw (1792-1827) [q. v.] were his brothers. In boyhood he lost his leg through an accident. In 1819 he was called to the Scottish bar, and in 1821 he commenced with his friend James Ballantine, and afterwards with Alexander Dunlop, a series of reports of the decisions in the court of session. In 1824 he commenced a similar series of reports of decisions in the House of Lords on appeal from the Scottish courts. These reports have been of great value to Scottish lawyers, and Shaw enhanced their usefulness by publishing supplementary digests of the decisions.

In 1848 Shaw was appointed sheriff of chancery, and he held the post till 1869, when he resigned owing to failing health. He died at 36 Charlotte Square, Edinburgh, on 12 Feb. 1872. In 1860 he married the fourth daughter of William Fullarton of Skeldon, Ayrshire.

His publications are: 1. 'Cases decided in the Court of Session,' Edinburgh, 1821-1827, 5 vols. 8vo; new edition with notes, 1831, continued to 1838, vols. vi.-xvi., 1838-52. 2. 'Cases decided in the House of Lords on Appeal from the Courts of Scotland,' 1821-4, 2 vols. 8vo, 1824-6; from 1825 to 1834, 7 vols. 8vo, 1829-39; from 1835 to 1838, 3 vols. 8vo, 1836-9. 3. 'Cases decided in the Court of Teinds from 1821 to 1831,' Edinburgh, 1831, 8vo. 4. 'Digests of Cases decided in the Courts of Session, Teinds, and Judiciary, and in the House of Lords from 1821 to 1833, and in the Jury Courts from 1815 to 1833,' Edinburgh, 1834, 8vo; from 1832 to 1837, 2 vols. 1838, 8vo. 5. 'Digest of Cases decided in the Supreme Courts of Scotland from 1800 to 1842,' 2 vols. 1843-4, royal 8vo; from 1842 to 1852, royal 8vo, 1852; new edition, 1808-9, 8vo. 6. 'Forms of Process in the House of Lords, Court of Session, Privy Court, Court of Teinds, and Sheriff Court,' Edinburgh, 1843, 2 vols. 8vo. 7. 'Treatise on the Law of Obligation and Contracts in Scotland,' 1847, 8vo. 8. 'Principles of the Law of Scotland' contained in Lord Stair's 'Institutions,' Edinburgh, 1863, 8vo. He also edited the sixth edition of Bell's 'Commentaries on the Laws of Scotland,' Edinburgh, 1858, 4to, and the fifth edition of Bell's 'Principles of the Law of Scotland,' Edinburgh, 1860, 8vo.

[Private information; Scotsman, 16 Feb. 1872; Scott's Eccl. Fasti Scot. vol. ii. pt. i. p. 100; Allibone's Dict. of Authors.] E. I. G.

SHAW, PETER (1694-1763), physician and author, born in 1694, presumably at Lichfield, was the son of Robert Shaw, A.M., master of the grammar school at Lichfield, and the descendant of an old Berkshire family. After passing some years of professional life at Scarborough, he was practising physic in London in 1726, apparently without a degree or the licence of the College of Physicians, but did not permanently settle there until some years later. Meanwhile he was 'usefully employed in facilitating the study of chemistry in England by his excellent translations of the works of Stahl and of Boerhaave, as well as by his own writings and lectures.' On 25 June 1740 he was admitted a licentiate of the Royal College of Physicians, London, being then a doctor of medicine, but of what university is not recorded. In London he attained popularity as a physician. He was warmly patronised by Sir Edward Hulse, bart., one of the court physicians, then gradually withdrawing himself from practice. He was admitted a candidate at the College of Physicians on 16 April 1753, and was made a fellow on 8 April of the following year. In 1752 he was appointed physician-extraordinary to George II, and the same year was created doctor of medicine at Cambridge by royal mandate. Two years later he was promoted to be physician-in-ordinary to the king, and he was the usual medical attendant upon George II in his journeys to Hanover. He was nominated to the same office on the accession of George III. He died on 16 March 1763, aged 69 years, and was buried in the nave of Wimbledon church, where there is an inscription to his memory. A portrait of Dr. Shaw was presented to the Royal College of Physicians by Mrs. Pelham Warren in 1836. He married Frances, daughter of John Hyde, esq., of Quorndon in Leicestershire. His daughter Elizabeth became the wife of Dr. Richard Warren [q. v.]. The latter feelingly portrayed his father-in-law's services to literature and science in his 'Harveian Oration' of 1763.

Shaw wrote largely, and in some instances hastily. His most valuable literary work was done as editor of the works of Bacon and Boyle. His edition of 'The Philosophical Works of the Hon. Robert Boyle, abridged, methodised, and disposed under the general heads of Physics, Statics, Pneumatics, Natural History, Chemistry, and Medicine' (with notes), appeared in 3 vols. 4to, London, 1725; and he published his abridgment of the 'Philosophical Works of Francis Bacon, Baron of Verulam,' in 8 vols. 4to, London, in 1733; French edit. 1765, 12mo.

Shaw's translations or adaptations included 'The Dispensatory of the Royal College of Physicians of Edinburgh, from the Latin,' 8vo, London, 1727; 'A New Method of Chemistry, including the Theory and Practice of the Art,' a translation of Boerhaave's 'Institutiones Chemiæ,' 4to, London, 1727; 'Philosophical Principles of Universal Chemistry,' from the 'Collegium Jenense' of G. E. Stahl, 8vo, London, 1730; 'New Experiments and Observations upon Mineral Waters, by Dr. F. Hoffman, extracted from his works, with notes, &c.,' 'Pharmacopœia Edinburgensis,' translated 1746-8, 8vo; 'Novum Organum Scientiarum' (Bacon), translated 1802, 8vo (another edition 1818, 12mo).

His original publications were: 1. 'The Dispensatory of the Royal College of Physicians,' 8vo, London, 1721. 2. 'A Treatise of Incurable Diseases,' 4to, London, 1723. 3. 'Prælectiones Pharmacentiæ,' or a course of lectures in pharmacy, 1723, 4to. 4. 'The Juice of the Grape, or Wine preferable to Water,' 1724, 8vo. 5. 'A New Practice of Physic,' 8vo, London, 1726; 2nd edit. 1728; the 7th edit. appeared in 1753. 6. 'Three Essays in Artificial Philosophy, or Universal Chemistry,' 8vo, London, 1731. 7. 'An Essay for introducing a Portable Laboratory, by means whereof all the Chemical Operations are commodiously performed for the purposes of Philosophy, Medicinal Metallurgy, and Family; with sculptures,' 8vo, London, 1731 (in conjunction with Francis Hauksbee). 8. 'Chemical Lectures read in London in 1731 and 1732, and at Scarborough in 1733, for the Improvement of Arts, Trades, and Natural Philosophy,' 8vo, London, 1734. 9. 'An Inquiry into the Contents and Virtues of the Scarborough Spa,' 8vo, London, 1734. 10. 'Examination of the Reasons for and against the Subscription for a Medicament for the Stone,' 8vo, London, 1738. 11. 'Inquiries on the Nature of Miss Stephens's Medicaments,' 8vo, London, 1738. 12. 'Essays for the Improvement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce, by means of Chemistry,' 8vo, London, 1761. 13. 'Proposals for a Course of Chemical Experiments, with a view to Practical Philosophy, Arts, Trade, and Business,' 8vo, London, 1761 (with Francis Hauksbee).

[Munk's Coll. of Phys; Thomson's Life, Lectures, and Writings of William Cullen, M.D.; Catalogue of Brit. Mus. Library.] W. W. W.

SHAW, ROBERT BARKLEY (1839-1879), traveller, son of Robert Grant Shaw, and his wife, Martha Barkley, was born at Upper Clapton on 12 July 1839, and was educated at schools on the continent, at Marlborough College, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. Unable to recover his health after an attack of rheumatic fever, he gave up the idea of entering the army, and in 1859 he went to Kangra in the Himalayas, where he settled as a tea-planter. An adventurous spirit, stimulated by study and unabated by the delicacy of his constitution, inspired him with a desire to penetrate the then almost unknown country north of the Karakoram; and, after one or two tentative excursions, he started in May 1868 for Eastern Turkestan, travelling as a merchant, but taking with him, besides such goods as seemed likely to find purchasers in Central Asia, a prismatic compass and Rawlinson's 'Herodotus.' He reached Yarkund on 8 Dec., Kashgar on 11 Jan. 1869; being the first Englishman to visit those places. At Kashgar, though not allowed to enter the city, he was treated with marked civility by Yakub Beg, the ruler of the country who, mainly in consequence of the advice given him by Shaw, despatched an envoy to India asking that a British officer might be sent to arrange a treaty. Shaw returned by the Karakoram Pass, and proceeded to England. While preparing an account of his journey for the press, he heard that Lord Mayo had decided to send an official mission to Eastern Turkestan. He at once telegraphed an offer of his services, which being accepted, he accompanied Mr. (afterward Sir Douglas) Forsyth on his first mission. Yakub Beg, when they arrived at Yarkund (8 Aug. 1870), was in another part of his dominions, and the mission came back with its principal object unachieved. Shaw returned to England, where in 1872 the Royal Geographical Society awarded him the patron's gold medal, Sir Henry Rawlinson stating that this distinction was given him 'for the services he had rendered to the cause of geography in exploring Eastern Turkestan; and above all for his very valuable astronomical observations.' In recognition of his service to government, Lord Mayo appointed him to the political department, and he was made British joint commissioner in Ladak. In 1876 he went to Yarkund in charge of the ratified treaty made by Sir Douglas Forsyth in 1874. In 1878 he was appointed resident at Mandalay in Upper Burma. During the troubles that ensued on the death of the king Mengdun (October 1878), his position at the residency was one of great danger; but throughout the crisis he acted with courage and discretion. He wrote to the king Thebaw, who was massacring kinsfolk and rivals wholesale, that if any further murders took place he should, without waiting for orders from Calcutta, at once haul down the British flag; and he sent at the same time his assistant to explain the consequences such a measure would involve. He died at Mandalay on 15 June 1879.

He published: 1. 'A Visit to High Tartary, Yarkund, and Kashgar,' London, 1871. 2. 'A Sketch of the Turki Language as spoken in Eastern Turkestan,' Lahore, 1875, 8vo. 3. 'The Ghalobah Languages,' Calcutta, 1876. He contributed to the Royal Geographical Society's 'Proceedings,' 'The Position of Pein, Charchand, and Lob Nor' (xvi. 242); and 'A Prince of Kashgar (Mirza Haidar, Doghlat) on the Geography of Turkistan' (xx. 482); and to the Royal Asiatic Society's 'Transactions,' 'On the Hill Canton of Salar, the most easterly Settlement of the Turki Race' (x. 305, new series).

[Obituary notice by Lord Northbrook in R.G.S. Proceedings (new series), i. 523; Parliamentary Papers, Burma, 1886; information supplied by Shaw's nephew, Major G. J. Younghusband, Queen's own corps of Guides.] S. W.

SHAW, SAMUEL (1635-1696), nonconformist divine, son of Thomas Shaw, blacksmith, was born at Repton, Derbyshire, in 1635. From Repton grammar school he went to St. John's College, Cambridge, where he was admitted sizar, 23 Dec. 1650, and graduated B.A. In 1656 he was appointed master of the grammar school at Tamworth, Warwickshire. His first publication was a funeral oration (1657) for Thomas Blake [q. v.], vicar of Tamworth. Before 15 Sept. 1657 he was called to be curate of the chapelry of Moseley, under John Hall, vicar of Bromsgrove, Worcestershire [see HALL, THOMAS, 1610-1665]. There being no classis in Worcestershire, he was ordained by the presbyterian classis of Wirksworth, Derbyshire, on 12 Jan. 1658. Some months later he was presented by Cromwell to the sequestered rectory of Long Wharton, Leicestershire (a crown living). His approbation and admission by the 'Triers' are dated 28 May 1658, and he took possession on 5 June. Walker errs in affirming that the sequestered rector, Henry Robinson (half-cousin of Archbishop Laud), regained the living at the Restoration. His death enabled Shaw to obtain a crown presentation under the great seal (1 Sept. 1660), and the act of the Convention parliament passed in the same month made good his title without institution. Next year, however, Shaw was removed (1661) from the living at the instance of Sir John Pretymann; he obtained no other, and the Uniformity Act (1662) disqualified him, as he refused to submit to reordination. He removed to Coates, in the parish of Prestwold, Leicestershire. Some relatives brought the plague thither from London in 1665, and Shaw lost two children. At the end of 1666 he removed to Ashby-de-la-Zouche, Leicestershire, and was appointed master of the grammar school there in 1668. Through Edward Conway, earl of Conway, he obtained a license (26 Dec. 1670) from Archbishop Sheldon, on a modified subscription, namely to the first, third, and first half of the second article, specified in the thirty-sixth canon. William Fuller [q. v.], bishop of Lincoln, who admired Shaw's book on the plague, added his own license, on a subscription 'dictated and inserted' by Shaw himself. Thomas Barlow [q. v.], who succeeded Fuller as bishop of Lincoln, was his correspondent. His school was very successful, and his house was full of boarders, including several who became divines in the established church. He wrote comedies for his scholars, 'which they acted for the entertainment of the town and neighbourhood at Christmas time.' He rebuilt the schoolhouse, and erected a gallery in the parish church for his scholars. On the passing of the Toleration Act (1689), he licensed his schoolhouse for nonconformist worship, preaching only between church hours (at noon), and attending the parish church with his scholars.

Shaw was of medium height and poor presence, with a sparkling eye, and brilliant conversational powers. He 'would droll innocently,' and could pour forth extempore prayer for two or three hours together 'without tautology.' He died on 22 Jan. 1698. He married a daughter of Ferdinando Pool (d. 1676), ejected from Thrumpton, Nottinghamshire. His son, Ferdinando Shaw, M.A., was ordained 14 April 1698, became minister of Friar Gate chapel, Derby, on 25 March 1699, published several sermons, as well as 'A Summary of the Bible,' 1780, 12mo, and died in 1744.

He published, besides sermons: 1. 'The Voice of One crying in the Wilderness,' 1686, 12mo; 1674, 12mo (includes 'A Welcome to the Plague' and two other pieces). 2. 'Immanuel,' 1667, 12mo (supplementary to No. 2); 4th edit. Leeds, 1804, 12mo (with memoir from Calamy). 3. 'The Great Commandment . . . annex'd the Spiritual Man in a Carnal Fit,' 1679, 12mo. 4. 'Words made Visible, or Grammar and Rhetoric,' a comedy, 1679, 8vo. 5. 'The True Christian's Test,' 1682, 8vo (consists of 149 meditations in two parts). 6. 'Grammatica Anglo-Romana,' 1687, 8vo. 7. 'Παικλοφρόνησις: or, The Different Humours of Men represented at an Interlude in a Country School,' 1692, 8vo. 8. 'An Epitome of the Latin Grammar,' 1698 (CALAMY). His farewell sermon at Long Whetton is the eighth in 'England's Remembrancer,' 1668, 12mo.

[Calamy's Account, 1713, pp. 426 sq. 638; Calamy's Continuation, 1727, ii. 592 sq. 699; Walker's Sufferings of the Clergy, 1714, ii. 345; Unitarian Herald, 2 Aug. 1878, p. 281; Minutes of Wicksorth Classis, in Journal of Derbyshire Archæol. and Nat. Hist. Soc. January 1880, pp.

211 sq.; Mayor's Admissions to St. John's College, 1882, i. 28; Evans's List of Congregations (manuscript in Dr. Williams's Library).]

A. G.

SHAW, STEBBING (1762-1802), topographer, son of Stebbing Shaw (d. 1799), rector of Hartshorn in Derbyshire, was born near Stone in Staffordshire, probably in the spring of 1762. His mother's maiden name was Hyatt, and she owned a small estate in Staffordshire, which passed to her son. He was educated at Repton school, and on 24 May 1780 was admitted as pensioner at Queens' College, Cambridge, where he made the acquaintance of Sir Egerton Brydges, who came up at the same time. He graduated B.A. 1784, M.A. 1787, and B.D. 1796, was elected scholar on 4 Feb. 1784, fellow on 13 Jan. 1786, and took orders in the English church.

About 1785 Shaw went to live at the house of (Sir) Robert Burdett at Ealing, to superintend the education of his son, the future Sir Francis Burdett [q. v.] In the autumn of 1787 tutor and pupil made a tour together 'from London to the western highlands of Scotland;' Shaw kept a private diary of their proceedings, which he published anonymously in 1788. It was received with little favour. He made a 'tour to the west of England in 1788,' and published an account of his travels in the following year. On this occasion he had studied the history of the places which he purposed visiting, and had made a careful investigation into the working of the mines in Cornwall. The book soon became popular, and was reprinted in Pinkerton's 'Voyages' and in Mayor's 'British Tourists' (1798 and 1809).

Brydges and he spent the autumn of 1789 in visiting the counties of Derby and Leicester, and in the summer of 1790 Shaw was in Sussex. In every parish he sought for information on the church and its leading families, and supplemented his collections by researches at the British Museum. The results of his investigations were embodied in the four volumes of the 'Topographer for 1789 to 1791,' which were edited by Brydges and himself, and the magazine contained many of his illustrations. A continuation, called 'Topographical Miscellanies,' appeared in 1792, but only seven numbers, forming one volume, were issued.

Shaw retired to his father's rectory at Hartshorn in the summer of 1791, and while there conceived the idea of compiling the history of his native county of Staffordshire. With great industry and ambition for authorship, he was possessed of good general knowledge and of considerable skill in drawing. The first volume of the 'History and Antiquities of Staffordshire' came out in 1798, and the first part of the second volume was published in 1801; a few pages only of the second volume passed through the press. It contained many of his own illustrations, some of which had already appeared in the 'Gentleman's Magazine,' and many unpublished plates are at the Salt Library, Stafford, and the British Museum (cf. SINUS, Bibliotheca Staffordiensis, p. 397). A large-paper copy, with copious additions and corrections by S. P. Wolferstan, is at the British Museum. Copies on large paper have fetched 88l.

Shaw was elected F.S.A. on 5 March 1795, and on 27 April 1798 he succeeded his father in the rectory of Hartshorn. In the beginning of 1801 he offered his services in examining the topographical and genealogical manuscripts at the British Museum, and the librarian 'by permission of the trustees engaged him at his own expense,' but his early death in London on 28 Oct. 1802 put an end to his labours (Harl. MSS., second preface, pp. 31-2). His death was a 'happy release,' he is said to have died insane, partly from application and partly from vexation about his history (POLWHELE, Traditions, ii. 549).

A letter by Shaw is printed in Pinkerton's 'Correspondence,' i. 396-8, and he assisted Nichols in his 'History of Leicestershire.' He was passionately fond of music, and was a proficient in playing the violin. A portrait of him was published in January 1844.

[Gent. Mag. 1802 ii. 1074, 1803 i. 9-11 (signed L. N. S., i.e. Samuel Egerton Brydges), 129; Upcott's English Topogr. iii. 1176-85; Nichols's Lit. Anecdotes, ix. 202-3; Nichols's Illustr. of Lit. iv. 712, v. 581, 662; Cox's Derbyshire Churches, iii. 381-2; Erdeswick's Staff. (ed. Harwood), pp. xlvii-viii; Nichols's Leicestershire, iii. 693, 998; Brydges's Recollections, i. 58; Brydges's Autobiogr. i. 64-5, 234; information from Dr. Ryle, Queens' College, Cambridge.] W. P. G.

SHAW, THOMAS (1694-1761), African traveller, the son of Gabriel Shaw, a shearman dyer of Kendal, Westmoreland, was born on 4 June and baptised at Kendal on 18 June 1694. He was educated at Kendal grammar school, where he gained an exhibition, and matriculated from Queen's College, Oxford, on 5 Dec. 1711, aged seventeen, graduating B.A. in 1716 and M.A. on 16 Jan. 1720. Later in 1720 he went out as chaplain to the English factory at Algiers. During his thirteen years' residence there he made a series of expeditions to Egypt, the Sinaitic peninsula and Cyprus (1721), Jerusalem, the Jordan, and Mount Carmel (1722), Tunis, and the ruins of Carthage (1727), in addition to various excursions 'in the interior of Barbary,' or in other words in Algeria, Tripoli, and Morocco. In Barbary he relates that travelling was comparatively safe, but in the Holy Land the 'wild Arabs' were very numerous, and his caravan was insufficiently protected by four companies of Turkish infantry and four hundred 'spahes,' while his personal danger was enhanced by his practice of loitering to inspect curiosities. Having married Joanna, widow of Edward Holden, at one time consul in Algiers, who had given him every assistance in his travels in Africa, Shaw returned to England in 1733. He had in his absence been elected a fellow of Queen's College (1727). He proceeded B.D. and D.D. in the year after his return, and was presented to the vicarage of Godshill in the Isle of Wight. He was also elected a fellow of the Royal Society (13 June 1734), having contributed to the 'Philosophical Transactions' of 1729 'A Geographical Description of the Kingdom of Tunis.' Four years later appeared his 'Travels or Observations relating to several parts of Barbary and the Levant,' Oxford, 1738, fol., a noble example of typography, illustrated by maps and plates, catalogues of animals, plants, fossils, coins and inscriptions, and a copious index. It was dedicated to George II, with a reference to the generous patronage of Queen Caroline. A plate of coins was dedicated to Dr. Richard Mead [q. v.] Dibdin calls the work 'a safe inmate' of a well-chosen collection. 'Fly, fly,' he says, 'to secure it' (Libr. Comp. 1824, ii. 48); it was especially esteemed on account of its illustrations of natural history, of classic authors, and of the scriptures. Shaw was no political observer, but a scholar, antiquary, and natural historian. He probably owed some botanical instruction to John Wilson (d. 1751) [q. v.] No less than 640 species of plants are described in his book. He also gives interesting descriptions of many mammals, of insects (especially of the locust swarms), and even of fishes. For his time his geological views are enlightened, while his conjectures on the subject of the pyramids have been fully confirmed by Belzoni and other investigators. Gibbon, in his 'Decline and Fall' (chap. xxiv.), honourably excepts him from the crowd of 'blind' travellers; his scrupulous fidelity was vindicated by James Bruce and by later African explorers (cf. KITTO, Palestine, pref. and SUMNER, White Slavery in the Barbary States). His accuracy was, however, impugned by Richard Pococke [q. v.] in his 'Description of the East' (vol. ii. 1745), and Shaw issued in 1743 'A Supplement . . . wherein some objections lately made are fully considered and answered,' and, in the following year, 'A further Vindication in a Letter to R. Clayton, bishop of Clogher.' Both these supplements were incorporated in the second and most valued edition, London, 1767, 4to, and in the third edition, Edinburgh, 1808, 2 vols. 8vo (cf. LOWNDES, Bibl. Man. ed. Bohn). The work was translated into German, Dutch (Amsterdam, 1780, 4to), and French (The Hague, 1743, 4to; reissued, with additions, Paris, 1880, 8vo).

On the death of Dr. Henry Felton, Shaw became, on 18 Aug. 1740, principal of Edmund Hall. He 'raised the hall from a ruinous condition by his munificence,' and was termed its 'instaurator.' Next year (7 Nov.) Shaw was appointed regius professor of Greek, in succession to Dr. John Fanshaw, and in 1742 he was presented by his college to the vicarage of Bramley in Hampshire. He died on 15 Aug. 1751, and was buried in Bramley church, where a monument was erected to his memory with a long Latin inscription by his friend, Dr. Joseph Browne, fellow (and afterwards provost) of Queen's College. A commemorative tablet was erected in the English church at Algiers; and a botanical species received the name Shawia in his honour. He left to the university several natural curiosities, the manuscript of his travels with corrections, and some antique coins and busts, three of which were engraved in the 'Marmora Oxoniensia.' In politics he was an almost bigoted Hanoverian (cf. WORDSWORTH, Social Life in the English Universities, p. 615). A portrait of Shaw 'from an original etching taken from life, in the possession of Sir William Musgrave, bart.,' is prefixed to the memoir in the 'European Magazines' (1791, i. 83); there are also portraits in oils in the common-room gallery at Queen's and at Edmund Hall. These represent 'a stout and fierce, but not ill-tempered, looking man' (note from Provost Magrath). His countenance is described as 'grotesque, but marked most strongly with jocularly and good humour.'

[Gent. Mag. 1751, p. 381; Foster's Alumni Oxon. 1600-1714; Nichols's Literary Anecdotes, ii. 288 (with epitaph); Nicholson's Annals of Kendal, 1861, p. 346; W. W.'s Westmoreland Worthies, No. xxxvii.; Works of the Learned, iv. 1, 79; Thomson's Hist. of Royal Society, App. p. xxxix; Notes and Queries, 7th ser. x. 28, 294; Macray's Annals of the Bodleian, 1890, p. 224; North American Rev. xxii. 409; Chalmers's Biogr. Diet.; Georgian Era, iii. 13; English Cyclopædia; Allibon's Dict. of English Lit.; Stevenson's Cat. of Voyages and Travels, No.

697; Richarderie's Bibl. Univ. des Voyages, iv. 18-37 (giving an excellent summary of Shaw's results); Shaw's Travels are also published in Pinkerton's Voyages and Travels, vol. xv., and portions of them as an appendix to Maundrell's Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem (1750), in 'A Compendium of Modern Travels,' 1767, vol. i., in Moore's Collection of Voyages (1785), and in The World Displayed, 1774, vols. xi. xvii. and xviii.] T. S.

SHAW, THOMAS BUDGE (1813-1862), author, seventh son of John Shaw (1776-1832) [q. v.], was born at Gower Street, London, on 12 Oct. 1813. In 1822 he accompanied his uncle, the Rev. Francis Whitfield, to Berberia in the West Indies, and on his return in 1827 entered the free school, Shrewsbury, where he became a favourite pupil of Dr. Samuel Butler [q. v.], afterwards bishop of Lichfield. In 1833 he went to Trinity College, Cambridge, and graduated B.A. in 1836. After acting as a private tutor, he in 1840 visited Russia and settled at St. Petersburg next year. There he made the acquaintance of M. Warrand, a professor at the university, and by his influence was in 1842 appointed professor of English literature at the Imperial Alexander Lyceum. In the same year he married M. Warrand's daughter Annette. In 1846, at the request of the authorities of the Lyceum, Shaw undertook to write a textbook of English literature. It was published in 1848 as 'Outlines of English Literature' (2nd edit. 1849). He visited England in 1851, and proceeded M.A. On his return to Russia he was made lecturer of English literature at the university of St. Petersburg. His lectures were much appreciated. From 1853 until his death he was tutor and professor of English to the grand dukes of Russia. He died suddenly of an aneurism on 14 Nov. 1862. His funeral was attended by a large concourse of past and present pupils, and a monument was erected to his memory by subscription at the Lyceum.

Although the impossibility of consulting at St. Petersburg the latest English authorities on the subject made some inaccurate statements and conclusions inevitable, Shaw's manual sets before the student the characteristics of the great writers in a way that arrests his attention and guides his taste. Since the author's death the book has been enlarged, many times reprinted, and incorporated in the series known as 'Murray's Students' Manuals.' Shaw contributed the article on St. Petersburg to the 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' 1859, and published 'The Heretic,' translated from the Russian of Lajestchnikoff, 3 vols. 1844, besides excellent translations from the Russian, Latin, Italian, and German in 'Blackwood's,' 'Fraser's,' and other magazines.

[Allibone's Dict. ii. 2062; Sir William Smith's Memoir to the 1864 edition of the Manual of English Literature.] E. L.

SHAW, WILLIAM (1550-1602), master of works to James VI of Scotland. [See SCHAW.]

SHAW, WILLIAM (1749-1831), Gaelic scholar, was born on 3 Feb. 1749 at Olachaig in the parish of Kilmorie in the island of Arran (New Statistical Account of Scotland, 1845, vol. v. pt. ii. p. 51). He was educated at Ayr and at King's College, Glasgow, where he graduated M.A. in 1772. On leaving the university he came to London, where he was employed by a merchant in the tuition of his children. He became acquainted with Dr. Johnson, and was one of the literary coterie which met at Bolt Court and Streatham Park. His first work, published by subscription, was 'An Analysis of the Gaelic Language,' London, 1778, 4to (2nd edit. Edinburgh, 1778, 8vo). A portion of the 'Proposals' for this work was written by Johnson. Shaw also formed the design of making a collection of all the vocabularies in the Gaelic language. He communicated the plan in 1778 to Johnson, who approved it. But an application for aid made to the Highland Club met with no success. Shaw, out of his own property, mustered between 200*l.* and 300*l.*, and started for the highlands. Johnson, in bidding him farewell, said: 'Sir, if you give the world a vocabulary of that language, while the island of Great Britain stands in the Atlantic ocean your name will be mentioned' (SHAW, Memoirs of Dr. Johnson, p. 152).

Entering the ministry of the church of Scotland, he was presented by the Duke of Gordon, in July 1779, to the parish of Ardealach in the presbytery of Nairn, of about 50*l.* yearly value; but, being dissatisfied, he resigned the charge 1 Aug. 1780 (HEW SCOTT, Fasts, iii. 242). After having travelled three thousand miles in Scotland and Ireland he completed his vocabulary, and published it under the title of 'A Gaelic and English [and an English and Gaelic] Dictionary, containing all the Words in the Scottish and Irish Dialects of the Celtic that could be collected from the Voice and Old Books and MSS.,' 2 vols. London, 1780, 4to. On 20 Jan. 1786 he won an action in the court of session against some of the subscribers, who contended that they were not bound to accept the book because it was defective. It was admitted that he 'had not fulfilled the terms of his printed proposals.' The highlanders had refused to give him information unless he paid them for it. Thereupon Shaw proceeded to Ireland, where the peasantry received him with more urbanity, the result being that the work contained an undue proportion of strictly Irish words (REID, Bibliotheca Scoto-Celtica, p. 56).

Shaw was elected a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries on 17 May 1781. In the controversy with James Macpherson (1736-1796) [q. v.] respecting the authenticity of his Ossian, he aided with Dr. Johnson, and published 'An Enquiry into the Authenticity of the Poems ascribed to Ossian,' London, 1781, 8vo (Dublin, 1782); a second edition, with a reply to Dr. John Clark's answer, was published at London in 1782, and also at Dublin, part of the reply being from Johnson's pen. This was followed, in 1784, by 'A Rejoinder to an Answer from Mr. Clark on the subject of Ossian's Poems.' He next published 'Memoirs of the Life and Writings of . . . Dr. Samuel Johnson, containing many valuable Original Letters, and several interesting anecdotes, both of his literary and social connections. The whole authenticated by living evidence' (anon.), London, 1785, 8vo, an extremely rare work.

He had been induced by Johnson to renounce presbyterianism and to take holy orders in the church of England. He subsequently graduated B.D. from Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in 1800. On 1 May 1795 he was presented by Sir Charles Kemeys Tynte, bart., to the rectory of Chelvey, Somerset. In 1801 he published at Bath 'Suggestions respecting a Plan of National Education, with Conjectures on the probable Consequences of non-descript Methodism and Sunday Schools;' and 'The Life of Hannah More, with a Critical Review of her Writings. By the Rev. Sir Archibald MacSarcasm, bart.,' appeared in London in 1802. He died at Chelvey on 16 Sept. 1831, aged 83 (Bristol Mirror, 24 Sept. 1831).

[Biogr. Dict. of Living Authors, 1816; Boswell's Life of Johnson; European Mag. 1782, i. 38; Gent. Mag. 1781 pp. 251, 621, 1801 ii. 1116, 1117, 1831 ii. 378; Halkett and Laing's Dict. of Anon. Lit. ii. 1473; Lit. Memoirs of Living Authors, 1798, p. 247; O'Donovan's Irish Grammar, Introd. p. lviii; Notes and Queries, 2nd ser. v. 377, 5th ser. xi. 486, xii. 78, 7th ser. ix. 280, 307, 391, 498; Reid's Bibl. Scoto-Celtica, pp. 61, 65.] T. O.

SHAW, WILLIAM (1797-1853), agricultural writer, eldest son of John Shaw of Bath, was born there in 1797. He spent two years (June 1818 to June 1815) at Wadham

College, Oxford (GARDINER, Reg. ii. 261), and was admitted to the Inner Temple on 20 June 1823, being called to the bar on 22 Nov. 1833. He first came into public prominence in connection with his efforts towards the establishment of the Royal Agricultural Society (MARTINEAU, Thirty Years' Peace, iv. 448, ed. 1878). He took a leading part in the preliminary work of forming this society, and at the inaugural meeting held on 9 May 1838 [see under SPENCER, JOHN CHARLES, third EARL SPENCER] he was chosen the first secretary, a position which he resigned in the following year, when he was elected (7 Aug. 1839) a member of the council. He was at this time editor of the 'Mark Lane Express' and of the 'Farmer's Magazine,' and his pen was busy for many years in advocating agricultural reforms and improvements. In 1838 he started with his lifelong friend, Cuthbert William Johnson [q. v.], the 'Farmers' Almanack and Calendar,' which continued to be issued annually in their joint names, notwithstanding Shaw's death in 1853, until 1872. In 1844 Shaw and Johnson brought out an English edition of Von Thaer's 'Principles of Agriculture.'

Shaw was a great supporter of farmers' clubs, and a frequent speaker and reader of papers at them. The establishment of the (London) Farmers' Club in 1840 was greatly owing to his efforts, and he was honorary secretary from 1840 to 1843. He read before this body six papers on tenant right and two on agricultural statistics. He took up enthusiastically the then novel but soon burning question of tenant right. In 1849 Shaw, with Henry Corbet (who subsequently succeeded him as editor of the 'Mark Lane Express'), published a digest of the evidence on tenant right given in the previous year before the famous committee of the House of Commons presided over by Philip Pusey [q. v.]. This digest was very popular, and is still useful for reference; a second edition appeared in 1854. On 1 April 1850 Shaw was presented with a service of silver plate by the tenant farmers for his advocacy of their cause, when he was described by the chairman who made the presentation as 'the Cobden of Agriculture' (Farmer's Mag. 1850, xxi. 407). He was one of the chief founders of the Farmers' Insurance Company (established in 1840, and amalgamated in 1888 with the Alliance Insurance Company), of which he was managing director. He was managing director also of a less successful venture, the Farmers' and Graziers' Mutual Cattle Insurance Association, established 1844, which fell into difficulties in 1849.

Other financial ventures of his proved unsuccessful, and during the time of the railway mania he became peculiarly embarrassed. In November 1852 he fled to Australia, where, some time in 1853, he died very miserably in the gold diggings far up the country, with only a few pence in his pocket. He was married, but lived apart from his wife. Shaw was of commanding presence and had fine features. There is a small portrait of him by Richard Ansdell (1842) in the rooms of the Royal Agricultural Society at 18 Hanover Square. This was reproduced in the engraving of the society subsequently published in 1843.

[Mark Lane Express and Farmer's Magazine, passim; Minute-Books of the Royal Agricultural Society; Journal of Farmers' Club, February 1877 and December 1892; private information.]
E. C. B.

SHAW, WILLIAM (1828-1895), Irish politician, was born in Moy, co. Tyrone, on 4 May 1828. His father, Samuel Shaw, was a congregational minister. He received his education privately, and spent some time at Trinity College, Dublin, but never proceeded to a degree. Being intended for the congregational ministry, he studied at a theological seminary at Highbury, and in 1846 was inducted into the independent church in George's Street, Cork. Shaw remained for four years in this position; but in 1850 definitely abandoned the clerical profession for a mercantile career on his marriage to Charlotte Clear, daughter of a wealthy corn merchant in Cork.

Shaw made his first attempt to enter political life in 1859. At the general election of that year he stood as a liberal for the old borough of Bandon, but was defeated by a small majority. He suffered a second defeat in the same constituency in 1865, but in 1868 he was successful by three votes, and sat through the whole of the 1868-74 parliament, strenuously supporting the church and land legislation of Mr. Gladstone. When Isaac Butt [q. v.] formulated his home-rule proposals in 1871, Shaw, who in his youth had had some connection with the young Ireland movement, accepted the new policy, and his position in the movement was so conspicuous that he was called on to preside at a home-rule convention held at the Rotunda in November 1873. At the general election of 1874 Shaw was returned for the county of Cork without opposition as an avowed home-ruler. In 1877 he was selected as the spokesman of his party on a motion for a select committee of the House of Commons to inquire into the demand for an Irish parliament. Until the death of Butt in May 1879 he was a steadfast supporter of that politician. By that time, in virtue of the moderation of his views and the prudence and sagacity of his political conduct, he had earned a considerable position in the House of Commons, and his extensive business connections gave him a certain weight with the English liberal party beyond that possessed by most of his colleagues. Shaw was accordingly selected to succeed Butt as chairman of the Irish party, and held the post until the dissolution of parliament in 1880. Perhaps the most important part of Shaw's political career was his appointment in 1880 to a seat on the Bessborough commission, which was appointed to inquire into the tenure of Irish land [see PONSONBY, FREDERICK GEORGE, fourth EARL OF BESSBOROUGH]. It was upon the report of this commission that Mr. Gladstone mainly based the provisions of the Land Act of 1881. On the passing of that measure Shaw is understood to have declined an offer of the post of land commissioner.

Meanwhile his relations with his own party had grown unsatisfactory. An active section of the party, led by Charles Stewart Parnell [q. v.], disapproved his moderation. After the general election of 1880, when he was again returned for co. Cork by a very large majority, Parnell and his followers disowned his leadership, and when he was proposed for re-election as chairman (17 May), Parnell was chosen by twenty votes to eighteen. Thenceforward, though he made some attempt in one or two rather violent speeches to recover his position, Shaw and his friends, who had little sympathy with the land league movement and were opposed to the creation of a peasant proprietary in Ireland, ceased to act with the advanced section, and on 12 Jan. 1881 they finally and formally seceded from the Irish party. From that time Shaw gave a general support to Mr. Gladstone, and the votes of himself and those with whom he acted saved the liberal government from defeat on at least one occasion.

Though possessing a reputation for prudence and judgment which in the political world earned him the sobriquet of 'Sensible Shaw,' Shaw was unfortunate in later life in his commercial undertakings. In 1885 the Munster Bank, which he had practically founded and of which he was chairman, was obliged to close its doors. Shaw, being unable to meet his personal liabilities, was in 1886 declared a bankrupt. He had previously, on the dissolution of parliament in 1885, retired from public life. Shaw's last years were spent in seclusion and in the shadow of commercial and domestic misfortune. He died on 19 Sept. 1896.

[Lucy's Diary of Two Parliaments; McCarthy's Ireland since the Union; private information.]
C. L. F.

SHAW-KENNEDY, SIR JAMES
(1788-1865), general. [See KENNEDY.]

SHAW-LEFEVRE, CHARLES, VISCOUNT EVERSLEY (1794-1888), born on 22 Feb. 1794, was the eldest son of Charles Shaw, a barrister, of a Yorkshire family, and M.P. for Reading from 1803 to 1820. His father on his marriage with Helena, only daughter of John Lefevre, a member of a Normandy family long settled at Heckfield Place, Hartfordbridge, Hampshire, assumed the additional name of Lefevre. Sir John Shaw-Lefevre [q. v.] was his younger brother. Charles was at school at Winchester College, then went to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1815 and M.A. in 1819, and was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1819, but practised very little. He at once took to politics and was active in his brother-in-law Samuel Whitbread's contest for Middlesex in 1820, but from his father's death in 1823 resided principally in Hampshire, interesting himself in county business and in the yeomanry drill. In 1830 he entered parliament for Lord Radnor's pocket borough of Downton in Wiltshire, and in 1831, after a severe contest, was returned for the county of Hampshire. The county was divided into two portions by the act of 1832, and thenceforward, till his elevation to the peerage, he sat for the northern division. He was a steady supporter of the whig government, but, though he moved the address in 1834, he spoke rarely. For some years he was chairman of a committee on petitions for private bills, and in 1835 was chairman of a committee on agricultural distress. He was chairman of the select committee on procedures in 1838, and carried his report almost unanimously. By attending closely to the work of these committees and to the forms of the house, and by his natural fair-mindedness and temper, he gained a reputation which led to his selection in 1839, in spite of Spring-Rice's claims as the government candidate, to succeed Abercromby in the chair. He was in fact rather the choice of the party than of its leaders. He was elected in a full house on 27 May by a majority of 317 to 299 votes for Goulburn. He was re-elected in 1841, in spite of Peel's possession of a majority, which could easily have ousted him, and again in 1847 and 1852, on each occasion unanimously. He proved himself a speaker of distinction. He set himself to reform procedure, and during the stormy debates on Irish questions in O'Connell's time, and afterwards on free trade, maintained order firmly and impartially. He was very dignified, strong, and tactful, and the business of the house benefited greatly by his election (WALPOLE, Life of Lord John Russell, i. 323). A volume of his decisions was published by the Hon. Robert Bourke in 1857, and to him is due the removal of many unsuitable forms now forgotten. In 1857, having served longer than any other speaker except Onslow, he decided to retire, and withdrew on 11 March. He was then raised to the peerage on 11 April as Viscount Eversley of Heckfield, and received a pension. He was nominated a church estates commissioner, which office he resigned in 1859 on becoming an ecclesiastical commissioner, and was a trustee of the British Museum. Though often present, he rarely spoke in the House of Lords, but he busied himself in the public affairs of his county, where he resided at Heckfield; he was high steward of Winchester, governor and lord-lieutenant of the Isle of Wight, colonel of the Hampshire yeomanry, and even down to July 1879 was chairman of quarter sessions. He was made a G.C.B. in 1885. He took a keen interest in sport and in agriculture, and was active almost till the day of his death, 28 Dec. 1888. He died at his house in Hampshire, but was buried beside his wife at Kensal Green cemetery, London, on 2 Jan. 1889. He married, 24 June 1817, Emma Laura, daughter of Samuel Whitbread, M.P. for Bedford (she died in 1857), and by her had three sons, who died young, and three daughters; the title became extinct on his death, but his nephew was created Baron Eversley in 1906.

[Manning's Lives of the Speakers; Walpole's Hist. of England, iii. 480; McCullagh Torrens's Life of Lord Melbourne, ii. 295; Annual Register, 1888; Times, 29 Dec. 1888.] J. A. H.

SHAW - LEFEVRE, SIR JOHN GEORGE (1797-1879), public official, younger brother of Charles Shaw-Lefevre, viscount Eversley [q. v.], was second son of Charles Shaw, who assumed the additional name of Lefevre on his marriage with Helena, daughter and heiress of John Lefevre of Heckfield Place, Hampshire, a gentleman of Huguenot descent. John George was born at 11 Bedford Square, London, on 24 Jan. 1797, and educated at Eton, whence he proceeded to Trinity College, Cambridge, graduating as a senior wrangler in 1818, and becoming a fellow of Trinity in 1819. He then spent some months abroad and made a tour in Italy, devoting himself to acquiring French and Italian. In 1822 he entered at the Inner Temple, was called to the bar in 1825, and before long met with some success as a conveyancer.

In 1833 Shaw-Lefevre was selected by government to settle the divisions of the counties for the purposes of the Reform Act of that year. His recommendations were embodied in a series of reports and maps which were the result of great labour; they were almost all accepted by parliament, and gave general satisfaction. In October 1833 he was elected to parliament as a liberal for Petersfield by a majority of one vote, but lost his seat on petition. Shortly afterwards he was specially selected by Edward Smith Stanley (afterwards thirteenth earl of Derby) [q. v.] to be his under-secretary at the colonial office. Here he at once became a member of the slave compensation commission. At the end of 1834 he was appointed one of the three commissioners to carry into effect the new Poor-law Amendment Act, and one of the commissioners under whose auspices the colony of South Australia was founded. He was also prominently connected at this period with the founding of the London University, of which for twenty years, from 1842 to 1862, he was annually elected vice-chancellor.

The severe work of reorganising the poor-law system told upon Shaw-Lefevre's health, and in 1841 he was transferred to the board of trade as joint-assistant secretary. He was almost immediately appointed one of the committees to inquire into the losses on exchequer bills, and in 1845 of the South Australia committee. In 1848 he became a member of the emigration commission. In 1846 he was requested to mediate as to differences which had arisen between the Royal Scottish Academy, the Edinburgh Royal Institute, and the board of manufactures; in the result he recommended the foundation of the National Academy at Edinburgh. In the same year he was offered but declined the governorship of Ceylon. In 1847, having unsuccessfully contested the representation of the university of Cambridge, he was placed on the ecclesiastical commission. In this new capacity he devoted special attention to the questions of leases of church lands and the patronage of the bishops.

In 1848 Shaw-Lefevre was appointed deputy-clerk of the parliaments, but he still continued his work on commissions. In 1850 he proceeded to Edinburgh for the double purpose of reporting on the fishery board and making arrangements as to the unpopular annuity tax. He became a commissioner, with Lord Hatherley, for settling the claims of the church lessees; and when parliament reconstituted the ecclesiastical commission, he became the unpaid church estates commissioner. Later in the same year he successfully adjusted certain disputes as to pecuniary claims between the New Zealand Company and the colonial office. In 1861 he served with Lord Macaulay and others on the inquiry into the Indian civil service, which resulted in the adoption of open competition. In 1863 he served on the commission of inquiry into the inns of court and legal education.

In 1865 Shaw-Lefevre succeeded Sir George Henry Rose [q. v.] as clerk of the parliaments, and in the same year he and Sir Edward Ryan [q. v.] became the first two civil service commissioners, performing the functions which were afterwards vested in a paid commission. Although his multifarious duties told upon his health, it was only in 1862 that he resigned the office of civil service commissioner and the vice-chancellorship of the London University. He further served, with other specialists, as a member of the commissions on the digest of law (1866-70), restored standards (1868-70), and endowed schools (1869-71). As a member of the digest of law commission he took a share in the work of the 'Revised Edition of the Statutes' and the 'Analytical Index to the Statutes Revised.' He prepared an analysis of the standing orders of the House of Lords. He retired from office, on a pension, on 6 March 1875, and died on 20 Aug. 1879.

Shaw-Lefevre became F.R.S. in 1820, a K.C.B. in 1867, and D.O.L. of Oxford in 1868. In 1850 he was elected a bencher of the Inner Temple. He was one of the founders of the Athenaeum and Political Economy clubs. In 1871 he presided over the education department of the social science congress at Dublin.

He had a passion for acquiring languages, reading easily fourteen in all, including Hebrew. He began Russian after he was sixty-five. He translated and published 'The Burgomaster's Family' (1873) from the Dutch; other translations into verse from different languages have not been published. In this, as in his official work, his patience in inquiry and quickness of insight were conspicuous.

Shaw-Lefevre married, in 1824, Rachel Emily, daughter of Ichabod Wright of Mapperley, Nottingham. His only son, the Right Hon. George John Shaw-Lefevre, was created Baron Eversley in 1906.

[Times, 22 Aug. 1879; Proc. Royal Soc. 1879, No. 198; private information.] C. A. H.

SHAW. [See SHAW.]

SHAXTON, NICHOLAS (1485?-1556), bishop of Salisbury, born probably about 1485, was a native of the diocese of Norwich. He may have been a younger brother of one Thomas Shaxton of Bathley (or Bale) in Norfolk who, according to one pedigree (Add. MS. 5533, f. 196, Brit. Mus.), died in April 1537. Nicholas studied at Cambridge, where he graduated B.A. in 1500. Soon after he was elected a fellow of Gonville Hall, and commenced M.A. in 1510. In 1520 he was appointed a university preacher, and next year proceeded B.D. He is mentioned among those propagators of new views who used to frequent the 'White Horse' (Stayer, Parker, p. 12). He was president of Physick's Hostel, which was attached to Gonville Hall, 1512-3.

In February 1530 he was one of the committee of divines at Cambridge to whom, at Gardiner's instigation, the question of the king's marriage with Catherine of Arragon was referred by the university, and his name was marked by Gardiner as favourable to the king's views. In May following he was one of the twelve Cambridge divines appointed to serve on a joint committee with twelve of Oxford in examining English books likely to disturb the faith of the people. But his own orthodoxy was called in question not long afterwards; and in May next year, when he was admitted inceptor in divinity, though one of the regents wrote asking Richard Nix [q. v.], bishop of Norwich, to give him a license to preach in his diocese, the bishop was not so easily satisfied. From inquiries made at Cambridge he learned that the vice-chancellor had censured two points in a sermon which Shaxton had preached ad clerum on Ash Wednesday: first, that it was wrong to assert publicly that there was no purgatory, but not damnable to think so; and, secondly, that no man could be chaste by prayer or fasting unless God made him so. He had also confessed that he had prayed at mass that the clergy might be relieved of celibacy. These points he had been persuaded to give up so as to avoid open abjuration; but the vice-chancellor had compelled him and others who proceeded that year in divinity to take a special oath to renounce the errors of Wiclif, Huss, and Luther. The bishop, however, still insisted on a formal act of abjuration, because he had purchased heretical books and conveyed them into his diocese. And when Bilney was burned shortly afterwards at Norwich, recanting at the stake heresies much the same as Shaxton's, the bishop is reported to have said, 'Christ's mother! I fear I have burned Abel and let Cain go.'

In 1533, however, being then S.T.P., Shaxton was presented by the king to the parish church of Fuggleston (called Foulstone in the letters of presentation) in Wiltshire, and in the same year (3 Oct.) he was made treasurer of Salisbury Cathedral (LAS NEVS, ed. Hardy, ii. 617). His promotion was clearly due to Anne Boleyn, now queen, who appointed him her almoner; and next year Dr. Richard Sampson [q. v.], dean of the Chapel Royal, cordially conceded Cranmer's request that Shaxton should preach before the king the third Sunday in Lent, although other arrangements had already been made. On 27 April 1534 he was promoted to a canonry in St. Stephen's, Westminster, which he gave up early next year on obtaining the bishopric of Salisbury. He was elected to that see on 22 Feb. 1535, and consecrated by Cranmer and two other bishops at St. Stephen's Chapel, Westminster, on 11 April, the temporalities having been already restored to him on the 1st. He desired Cromwell to write to the canons of his cathedral to exact no oath of him for his bishopric, as he received it only from the king. A paper of this date speaks of a 'book,' apparently on political matters, which he had submitted to the king, and on which various judgments were passed by those to whom it was shown. On 4 June he wrote to Cromwell, cordially approving the king's letters directing the bishops to set forth his royal supremacy. On 8 July the liberties of his bishopric were restored, which were declared to have been forfeited by his predecessor, Cardinal Campeggio.

Early in 1536 Shaxton and Latimer were assessors, with Archbishop Cranmer, in examining a fanatic who said he had seen a vision of the Trinity and Our Lady, and had a message from the latter to preach that she insisted on being honoured as of old. Shortly after the same three bishops examined one Lambert (apparently the future martyr), who had said it was sin to pray to saints. His examiners were so far in sympathy with him that they all considered the practice unnecessary, but said it was not to be denounced as sin.

Shaxton owed his patroness, Anne Boleyn, at her death 200*l.*, which became a debt to the king. Cromwell also assisted him in his promotion, and received favours in return, such as the reversion of the chantership of Shaxton's cathedral and the promise of a prebend for a friend. On Anne Boleyn's death he wrote to Cromwell, piously hoping that he would be no less diligent in setting forth God's word than when she was alive, although her conduct had unfortunately dishonoured the good cause which she had promoted. Shortly afterwards, as a member of convocation, he signed not only the 'articles about religion' drawn up in 1536, but also the declaration 'touching the sacrament of holy orders,' and the reasons why general councils should be summoned by princes, and not by the sole authority of the pope. When the Lincolnshire rebellion broke out in October, he was called on to furnish two hundred men out of his bishopric to serve the king, and he was one of the six bishops 'of the king's late promotion' whom the rebels complained of as subverting the faith. Nor was he much more respected in his own cathedral city, where the king's proclamations as head of the church were torn down. His own chaplain, a Scot, who had been a friar, was put in prison by the mayor and aldermen for a sermon in which he threatened to inform the king's council of such matters. Shaxton indeed had other disputes with the municipal authorities, who claimed that the city was the king's city, while he maintained that by a grant of Edward IV it was the bishop's. This was an old controversy, but complicated by the Reformation changes, which the city did not love. The mayor and aldermen wrote earnestly to Cromwell against Shaxton having a confirmation of the liberties granted to his predecessors, and ultimately imprisoned his under-bailiff Goodall, notwithstanding that Cromwell had shown him favour for his zeal against popish observances.

In 1537 he took part in the discussion among the bishops as to the number of the sacraments, opposing John Stokesley [q. v.], bishop of London, who maintained that there were seven. Along with John Capon alias Salcott [q. v.], bishop of Bangor, he gave an opinion in favour of confirmation as being a sacrament of the New Testament, though not instituted by Christ himself. He also signed 'the bishops' book,' entitled 'The Institution of a Christian Man.' In 1538 he issued injunctions to his clergy, which were printed at the time by John Byddell (AMES, Typogr. Antiq., ed. Herbert, p. 487). Like other bishops of that day, however, he exercised his episcopal functions subject to the control of Cromwell, the king's vicegerent, who, tired of the numerous complaints preferred against him, said once that Shaxton had 'a stomach [i. e. temper] more meet for an emperor than for a bishop.'

Shaxton under-estimated the complete subservience required of him by the king and Cromwell. Writing to Cromwell in December 1537, he apologised by reason of debt for not sending the king a greater new year's gift than 20*l*. In 1538 he was told that the king considered him ungrateful for hesitating to grant him an advowson, on the plea that he had already given it away. To satisfy the king, he was compelled to re-demand it of the grantee, and wrote that he was 'in an hell' at the rebuke. Next year he was one of the bishops who opposed the six articles in parliament, till the king, as one of the lords present remarked, 'confounded them all with God's learning.' When the act was passed he and Latimer resigned their bishoprics. He was desired, when he gave in his resignation, to keep it secret; but it soon became known, and he wrote to ask Cromwell whether he should dress like a priest or like a bishop. Early in July he was seen in company with the archbishop of Canterbury in a priest's gown, 'and a carcanet tippet about his neck.' A congéd d'évêque was issued for Salisbury on the 7th. Shaxton was committed to the custody of Clerk, bishop of Bath and Wells. On 9 Nov. he wrote from his confinement at Orewell desiring liberty and a pension. He and Latimer seem each to have been allowed a pension of one hundred marks; but the first half-yearly payment was only made to him on 8 Dec. In the spring of 1540 he, like Latimer, had the benefit of the general pardon, but was released only with a prohibition from preaching or coming near London or either of the universities, or returning to his former diocese (Zurich Letters, i. 215, Parker Soc.) For some years he lived in obscurity, during which time the prohibition against preaching must have been relaxed, for he seems to have held a parochial charge at Hadleigh in Suffolk, whence in the spring of 1546 he was summoned to London to answer for maintaining false doctrine on the sacrament. He said when he left that he should either have to burn or to forsake the truth, and on 18 June he, with Anne Askew [q. v.] and two others, was arraigned for heresy at the Guildhall. All four were condemned to the flames; but the king sent Bishops Bonner and Heath, and his chaplains, Dr. Robinson and Dr. Redman, to confer with Shaxton and his fellow prisoner, Nicholas White, and they succeeded in persuading both of them to repudiate their heresy. On 9 July Shaxton signed a recantation in thirteen articles, which was published at the time with a prefatory epistle to Henry VIII, acknowledging the king's mercy to him in his old age. He was then sent to Anne Askew to urge her to do likewise; but Bonner had already tried in vain to persuade her, and she told Shaxton it would have been better for him that he had never been born. He was appointed to preach the sermon at her burning on 16 July. On Sunday, 1 Aug.—the day the London sheriffs were to be elected—he preached again at Paul's Cross, declaring 'with weeping eyes' how he fell into erroneous opinion, and urged his hearers to beware of heretical books.

In September he prevailed on Dr. John Taylor (d. 1554) [q. v.], afterwards bishop of Lincoln, who had been suspected of similar heresies, to sign the same articles as he had done. At his request the king gave him the mastership of St. Giles's Hospital at Norwich. Possibly it was in going down to Norwich that he revisited Hadleigh, and declared his recantation there also. He was taxed with insincerity; but from this time his life was at least consistent, and he expressed great grief for what he called his former errors, even during the protestant reaction under Edward VI. He was already married, but now put away his wife, giving her a pious exhortation in verse to live chaste and single. At the beginning of Edward's reign, on 6 March 1547, he was obliged to surrender to the king the Norwich hospital (Dep.-Keeper of Public Records, 8th Rep. App. i. 49). Under Mary he became suffragan to Thomas Thirbury [q. v.], bishop of Ely. Sitting at Ely on 9 Oct. 1555, along with the bishop's chancellor, he passed sentence on two protestant martyrs, Wolesey and Pygot. Next year (1556) he was the chief of a body of divines and lawyers at Cambridge before whom, on Palm Sunday eve (28 March), another heretic, John Hullier, was examined. He made his will on 5 Aug. following, and died immediately after; the will was proved on the 9th. He desired to be buried in Gonville Hall chapel, and left to that hall his house in St. Andrew's parish, Cambridge, his books, and some moneys.

[Letters and Papers of Henry VIII, vols. iv. and onwards; Crowley's Confutation of Shaxton's Articles; Foxe's Actes and Monuments; Wriothesley's Chron., Greyfriars Chron., Narratives of the Days of the Reformation (the last three Camden Soc.); Stowe's Annals, p. 692; Cooper's Athenæ Cantabr.; Cooper's Annals of Cambridge; Collett's Cat. of Oxf. Coll. Library, i. 49; Nesmith's Cat. of Corpus Christi MSS., p. 495; Laundowne MS. 979, ff. 176-7; Addit. MS. 5829, f. 63 b (Brit. Mus.); Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation; Strype's Works] J. G.

SHEA, DAVID (1777-1836), orientalist, son of Daniel Shea, a farmer, was born in the county of Limerick in 1777. He entered Dublin University on 8 June 1793, and in 1797 obtained a scholarship in classics. Unfortunately several of his friends belonged to the Society of United Irishmen, and through them he acquired a knowledge of some of the secrets of that association. In April 1798 the Earl of Clare, vice-chancellor of the university, held a visitation, at which he required the students severally to take an oath that they would inform against any whom they knew to be connected with the society. Shea, refusing to comply, was expelled from the university. He came to England, and obtained a mastership in a private school. But his knowledge of Italian soon procured him the post of chief clerk in a large mercantile establishment at Malta. While there he mastered Arabic, acquiring a knowledge not only of the classical language, but also of the chief current dialects. A project on the part of his employers to open a factory on the east coast of the Black Sea induced him to study Persian also. But the firm being compelled to withdraw from the Levant altogether, he was recalled to England. There he made the acquaintance of Dr. Adam Clarke [q. v.], who found him employment as a private tutor in the house of Dr. Laurell, and afterwards by his interest procured him an assistant professorship in the oriental department of the East India Company's College at Haileybury. On the institution of the Oriental Translation Fund, Shea was made a member of committee, and applied himself to translating Mirkhond's 'History of the Early Kings of Persia,' which was published in London in 1832. He next essayed a more important task, the translation of 'the Dabistân.' Before its conclusion, however, he died at Haileybury College on 11 May 1836. The translation of the 'Dabistân' was completed by Anthony Troyer, and published in Paris in 1843, and in London in 1844.

[Private information; Athenæum, 1836, p. 346; Troyer's Introduction to the Dabistân, p. 91; Journal of Royal Asiatic Society, 1837, App. p. 18; Webb's Compendium of Irish Biography, p. 470.] E. I. O.

SHEAFFE, SIR ROGER HALE (1763-1851), general, born in Boston, North America, on 15 July 1763, was the third son of William Sheaffe, deputy collector of his majesty's customs at Boston, by Susannah, eldest daughter of Thomas Child of Boston. On 1 May 1778, through the influence of Earl Percy, he received an ensigncy, and on 27 Dec. 1780 a lieutenantcy in the 5th foot. He served in Ireland from January 1781 to May 1787, and in Canada from July 1787 to September 1797. Under the orders of Sir Guy Carleton, first baron Dorchester [q. v.], instructed by Lieutenant-governor John Graves Simcoe [q. v.], he was employed on a public mission in 1794 to protest against certain settlements made by the Americans on the south shore of Lake Ontario. On 5 May 1795 he obtained his company in the 5th foot, on 13 Dec. 1797 a majority in the 81st foot, and on 23 March 1798 a lieutenant-colonelcy in the 49th. He served in Holland from August to November 1799, in the expedition to the Baltic from March to July 1801, and in Canada from September 1802 to October 1811. The rank of brevet colonel was conferred on him on 25 April 1808, and that of major-general on 4 June 1811. He again served in Canada from 29 July 1812 to November 1813. On 13 Oct. 1812 the troops of the United States took Queenstown on the Niagara, but on the same day Sheaffe, on the death of General Sir Isaac Brock, assuming the command of the British forces, recaptured the town, the Americans losing heavily in killed, wounded, and prisoners. In the following year, on 27 April, he defended the town of York (now known as Toronto), when the losses of the Americans in taking the place exceeded the total numbers of those opposed to them. Sheaffe continued to command in the upper province and to administer its government until June 1813, and on his retirement received flattering testimonials from the executive council. For his services he was, on 16 Jan. 1813, created a baronet of Great Britain, and further rewarded by the colonelcy of the 36th foot on 20 Dec. 1829, and his nomination as a general on 28 June 1838. He had a residence at Edswale, co. Clare, but died in Edinburgh on 17 July 1851, when his title became extinct. He married, in 1810, Margaret daughter of John Coffin of Quebec; she died at Bath on 1 May 1855.

[Royal Military Cal. 1820, iii. 166-8; Dod's Peerage, 1851, p. 428; Gent. Mag. June, 1855, p. 681; Annual Register, 1812 p. 302, 1813 p. 180; Appleton's American Biogr. 1888, v. 489, with portrait.] G. O. B.

SHEARES, JOHN (1766-1798), United Irishman, fourth son of Henry Sheares, esq. of Cork, and Jane Anne, daughter of Robert Bettsworth of Whitebrook, sister of Sergeant Bettsworth and a relative of the Earl of Shannon, was born at Cork in 1766. His father was a partner in the banking concern of Rogers, Travers, & Sheares, latterly generally known as Sheares's bank; he was an occasional contributor to the 'Modern Monitor,' the chief literary journal of Cork at the time. From 1761 to 1767 he represented the borough of Clonakilty in parliament, and in 1765 assisted Dr. Charles Lucas (1718-1771) [q. v.] in passing a bill (Act 5, Geo. III) for the better regulation of trials in cases of treason, whereby a copy of the indictment was to be furnished to prisoners and counsel assigned them. For his services he received a pension of 200*l.*, which he vacated on his appointment to the lucrative post of weigh-master of Cork. In 1774 he established a charitable institution in the city for the relief of persons confined for small debts. He died in the spring of 1776, bequeathing the bulk of his property to his eldest son, Henry (see below). Two other sons, Christopher and Richard, died in the king's service, the former as a soldier, of yellow fever, in the West Indies, the latter as lieutenant in the navy, while on board his majesty's ship Thunderer, lost on the West Indian station in the great hurricane of October 1779. A fifth son, Robert, was drowned in saving the life of John when as boys they were bathing together.

John, whose youth was passed at Glasheen, on the outskirts of Cork, inherited from his father a small fortune of 3,000*l.* Intended from the first for the legal profession, he received a liberal education at home and at Trinity College, Dublin, where he graduated B.A. in 1787. He was called to the Irish bar in the following year, and in 1792 he accompanied his brother Henry on a visit to his family in France. Here he became imbued with the political principles of the Revolution, though at first not so deeply as to prevent him, it is said, when paying a visit to Versailles, from falling on his knees and vowing to plunge a dagger in the heart of every Frenchman he met if a hair of the head of Marie-Antoinette were touched. He was, however, present at the execution of Louis XVI in January 1793, and, returning to England in the same packet-boat as Daniel O'Connell, he disgusted him by exhibiting a handkerchief which he exultingly declared to have been steeped in the murdered monarch's blood. Having established himself in Dublin, and being of frugal habits, buying hardly anything except books, he not merely managed to retain his fortune intact, but was making a fair income at the bar when he was drawn within the vortex of Irish politics.

It is doubtful when precisely he became a United Irishman; but in a speech in the House of Lords in July 1793, Lord Clare alluded to him and his brother as 'members of the French Jacobin Club . . . in the pay of that society to foment sedition in this country.' The statement was wide of the truth, but Sheares occupied the chair at a meeting on 16 Aug. when an address was voted to the Hon. Simon Butler and Oliver Bond [q. v.] on their release from prison, and was with difficulty restrained from carrying a message from the former to the lord chancellor. He showed his sympathy with the revolutionists by attending the funeral of the Rev. William Jackson [q. v.] in May 1795, and when the 'Press,' a violent anti-government newspaper, was started by Arthur O'Connor [q. v.] in October 1797, Sheares became a frequent contributor to it. Owing to the editor's acceptance of an article by Sheares signed 'Dion,' and addressed to Lord Clare, as 'the Author of Coercion,' the paper was suppressed on 6 March 1798, the day on which the article was to have appeared. The article was subsequently published in a volume called 'The Beauties of the Press,' London, 1800, pp. 566-74, and is reprinted by Madden in 'United Irishmen,' 1st ser. ii. 92-103. In the society itself Sheares possessed little influence, and apparently took only a languid interest in its affairs, being, it is said, mainly responsible for the unorganised state of county Cork, which had been assigned to him and his brother. His practice at the bar, owing to the hostility of Lord Clare, did not prosper, and about Christmas 1797 he spoke of going to America. But his conduct was governed by his affection for a young lady of the name of Steele, to whom he had become greatly attached in 1794, but whose marriage with him was opposed by her mother on the ground of the laxity of his morals.

After the arrest at Bond's house on 12 March 1798, when Sheares and his brother were elected to vacant places in the directory, his whole nature seemed to undergo a change. He was indefatigable in his exertions to repair the loss the society had suffered. The rising was fixed for 23 May. On the 10th of that month he made the acquaintance of John Warneford Armstrong, a captain in the King's County militia, who afterwards informed against him. Sheares revealed to him his plan for corrupting the army. Armstrong's professions of sympathy completely deceived Sheares. The brothers were arrested on 21 May, and confined in Kilmainham gaol. On 4 July they were arraigned on a charge of high treason before Chief-justice Carleton, but the trial was postponed till the 12th. On the eve of his trial Sheares wrote to his sister Julia that, while he had no doubt about his own fate, he believed that Henry would escape. They were defended by Curran, Plunket, and McNally, but there is little doubt that the prosecution were beforehand fully acquainted with the line of defence adopted by them (through McNally). The only witness against them was Armstrong, but additional evidence was furnished in the shape of an inflammatory proclamation, intended to be published when the revolt was announced, written avowedly by John, but found in Henry's possession. In the existing state of the law of treason in Ireland (1 & 2 Philip & Mary, cap. 10, unmodified by 7 & 8 Will. III, cap. 3), one accuser was held to be sufficient.

The trial had proceeded for fifteen hours when Curran, sinking with exhaustion, moved for an adjournment. The motion was opposed by the attorney-general, John Toler (subsequently fourth Earl of Norbury) [q. v.], and at eight o'clock on the following morning a verdict of 'guilty' against both the prisoners was returned. A painful scene followed (cf. LADY WILDE's poem, The Brothers). Desperate efforts were made to save the life of Henry, whom the fear of death and the fate awaiting his family completely unmanned. John's only thought was for his brother, for whose fate he felt he was responsible (cf. BARRINGTON, Rise and Fall of the Irish Nation, p. 365). After the trial the brothers were removed to Newgate. None of their friends or relatives were admitted to see them, and on the following day (14 July) they were publicly executed before the prison. Their heads were cut off and, with their bodies, laid in the crypt of St. Michan's.

HENRY SHEARES (1753-1798), John's senior by thirteen years, born at Cork in 1753, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin. He entered the army, but three years afterwards resigned his commission in the 61st regiment of foot, and, adopting the legal profession, was called to the bar in Michaelmas term 1789. He married, in April 1782, Alicia Swete, a lady who for his sake had rejected the hand of John Fitzgibbon (subsequently Earl of Clare) [q. v.] She was reputed an heiress, but, owing to her father's failure, brought no dowry to her husband. She was the mother of four children, and died on 11 Dec. 1791, being buried in the churchyard of St. Peter's, Aungier Street. The children were taken charge of by her parents, who were living in France, and it was while visiting them there that Henry imbibed his notions of republicanism. He had inherited the bulk of his father's property, amounting to about 1,200*l.* a year, but his extravagance compelled him more than once to draw on the slender resources of his brother. He married, secondly, in 1795, Sarah Neville, of Mary Mount, co. Kilkenny, by whom he had two children. As a barrister he was not very successful. In his political action he was wholly governed by the stronger will of his brother.

[Madden's United Irishmen, 1st ser. vol. ii.; Dublin Mag. 1793; Doran's Lough of Cork in Journal of the Cork Hist. Archaeol. Soc. 1st ser. ii. 237-42; Tenison's Private Bankers of Cork, ib. 1st ser. i. 246, and Cork M.P.s, ib. 2nd ser. ii. 276; Castlereagh Corresp. i. 148, 150, 227, 258; Fitzpatrick's Secret Service under Pitt, 2nd edit.; Howell's State Trials, xlvii. 255-398; O'Keeffe's Life and Times of O'Connell, i. 37; Lecky's England in the Eighteenth Century, viii. 33, 48, 189-91; Froude's English in Ireland, ed. 1887, iii. 319, 390, 396, 397, 403, 511, 528.]

R. D.

INDEX

TO

THE SEVENTEENTH VOLUME.

	PAGE		PAGE
Robinson, Anaetasia, afterwards Countess of Peterborough ( d. 1755) . . . . .	1	Robinson, Sir Tancred ( d. 1748) . . . . .	45
Robinson, Anthony (1762-1827) . . . . .	2	Robinson, Thomas ( fl. 1520-1561). See Robertson.
Robinson, Benjamin (1666-1721) . . . . .	3	Robinson, Thomas ( fl. 1568-1603) . . . . .	40
Robinson, Bryan (1680-1754) . . . . .	4	Robinson, Thomas ( fl. 1622). See under Robinson, Thomas ( fl. 1568-1603).
Robinson, Sir Bryan (1808-1887) . . . . .	5	Robinson, Thomas ( d. 1719) . . . . .	46
Robinson, Sir Christopher (1766-1833) . . . . .	5	Robinson, Thomas ( d. 1747) . . . . .	47
Robinson, Clement ( fl. 1586-1684) . . . . .	6	Robinson, Thomas, first Baron Grantham (1595-1770) . . . . .	47
Robinson, Daniel George (1826-1877) . . . . .	6	Robinson, Sir Thomas (1700?-1777), 'long Sir Thomas' . . . . .	49
Robinson, Frederick John, Viscount Goderich, afterwards first Earl of Ripon (1782-1859) . . . . .	7	Robinson, Thomas, second Baron Grantham (1768-1786) . . . . .	51
Robinson, Sir Frederick Philipse (1763-1852) . . . . .	11	Robinson, Thomas (1749-1818) . . . . .	52
Robinson, George (1787-1801) . . . . .	12	Robinson, Thomas (1700-1878) . . . . .	53
Robinson, Hastings (1792-1868) . . . . .	13	Robinson, Thomas Romney (1792-1882) . . . . .	58
Robinson, Henry (1658?-1616) . . . . .	13	Robinson, William ( d. 1768). See under Robinson, William (1720?-1775).
Robinson, Henry (1695?-1664?) . . . . .	14	Robinson, William (1720?-1775) . . . . .	55
Robinson, Henry Crabb (1776-1867) . . . . .	15	Robinson, William (1726?-1808) . . . . .	55
Robinson, Hercules (1789-1864) . . . . .	17	Robinson, William (1799-1889) . . . . .	56
Robinson, Hugh (1684?-1655) . . . . .	17	Robinson, William (1777-1848) . . . . .	56
Robinson, John ( d. 1599) . . . . .	18	Robinson, William ( d. 1870). See under Robinson, Sir Christopher.
Robinson, John (1576?-1625) . . . . .	18	Robinson-Montagu, Henry, sixth Baron Rokeby (1798-1858). See under Robinson-Morris, Matthew, second Baron Rokeby in the peerage of Ireland.
Robinson, John (1617-1681) . . . . .	22	Robinson-Morris, Matthew, second Baron Rokeby in the peerage of Ireland (1718-1800) . . . . .	56
Robinson, John (1660-1728) . . . . .	23	Robinson-Morris, Morris ( d. 1829). See under Robinson-Morris, Matthew, second Baron Rokeby in the peerage of Ireland.
Robinson, John (1715-1745) . . . . .	26	Robinson, John (1789-1805) . . . . .	57
Robinson, John (1682-1762) . . . . .	26	Robinson, Sir John (1778-1848). See under Robinson, John.
Robinson, John (1737-1802) . . . . .	26	Robotham, John ( fl. 1654) . . . . .	59
Robinson, John, D.D. (1774-1840) . . . . .	28	Roh Roy. See MacGregor.
Robinson, Sir John Beverley (1791-1863) . . . . .	28	Rohsart, Amy ( d. 1590). See under Dudley, Robert, Earl of Leicester.
Robinson, John Henry (1796-1871) . . . . .	29	Robson, Charles (1698-1688) . . . . .	60
Robinson, Mrs. Martha Walker (1822-1888), writer on French history under her maiden name of Freer . . . . .	80	Robson, Edward (1768-1818). See under Robson, Stephen.
Robinson, Mary (1758-1800), known as 'Perdita' . . . . .	60	Robson, George Fennell (1788-1868) . . . . .	61
Robinson, Mary ( fl. 1802), 'Mary of Buttermere.' See under Hatfield, John.		Robson, James (1788-1806) . . . . .	61
Robinson, Matthew (1628-1694) . . . . .	88	Robson, Stephen (1741-1779) . . . . .	62
Robinson, Nicholas ( d. 1585) . . . . .	84	Robson, Thomas Frederick (1822?-1864), whose real name was Thomas Robson Brownhill . . . . .	63
Robinson, Nicholas, M.D. (1697?-1775) . . . . .	86	Robson, William (1795-1868) . . . . .	64
Robinson, Peter Frederick (1778-1858) . . . . .	86	Roby, John (1798-1860) . . . . .	65
Robinson, Ralph ( fl. 1551) . . . . .	87	Roby, William (1768-1880) . . . . .	65
Robinson, Ralph (1614-1655) . . . . .	97
Robinson, Richard ( fl. 1574). See under Robinson, Richard ( fl. 1578-1600).
Robinson, Richard ( fl. 1578-1600) . . . . .	87
Robinson, Richard, first Baron Rokeby in the peerage of Ireland (1709-1794) . . . . .	89
Robinson, Robert (1785-1790) . . . . .	40
Robinson, Robert, D.D. (1787?-1701) . . . . .	43
Robinson, Sir Robert Spencer (1809-1889) . . . . .	48
Robinson, Samuel (1794-1864) . . . . .	44
Robinson, Sir Septimus (1710-1765). See under Robinson, Richard, first Baron Rokeby in the peerage of Ireland.

	PAGE		PAGE
Rochard, François Théodore (d. 1858). See under Rochard, Simon Jacques.		Roestratan, Pieter van (1627-1700)	98
Rochard, Simon Jacques (1788-1872)	66	Roettiers, James (1665-1699)	98
Roehe, Sir Boyle (1748-1807)	66	Roettiers, James (1898-1772). See under
Roche, David, Viscount Fermoy (1578?-1635)	66	Roettiers, James (1665-1698)
Roche, Eugenius (1766-1820)	68	Roettiers, James (1707-1784). See under
Roche, James (1770-1858)	60	Roettiers, Norbert.
Roche, Maurice, Viscount Fermoy (1595?-1660?). See under Roche, David, Viscount Fermoy.		Roettiers, Roettier, or Rotier, John (1681-1708)	98
Roche, Michael de la (fl. 1710-1781)	89	Roettiers, Norbert (1665?-1727)	100
Roche, Philip (d. 1708)	70	Roger de Breteuil, Earl of Hereford (fl. 1071-1075). See Fitzwilliam, Roger.
Roche, Mrs. Ragina Maria (1784?-1845)	71	Roger de Montgomery, Earl of Shrewsbury and Arundel (d. 1008?). With his sons:
Roche, Robert (1576-1629)	71	Philip of Montgomery (d. 1000), and Arnulf, Earl of Pembroke (fl. 1110)	101
Rochas, John Thomas (1814-1878)	71	Roger Bigod (d. 1107). See under Bigod, Hugh, first Earl of Norfolk.
Roches, Peter des (d. 1288). See Peter.		Roger the Poitevin (fl. 1110). See under Rochester, Earls of. See Wilmot, Henry, first Earl, 1612?-1858; Wilmot, John, second Earl, 1647-1690; Hyde, Laurence, first Earl of the Hyde family, 1641-1711.		Roger de Montgomery, Earl of Shrewsbury and Arundel.
Rochester, Countess of (d. 1725). See Hyde, Jane.		Roger Infans (fl. 1124)	103
Rochester, Viscount. See Carr, Robert (d. 1645), afterwards Earl of Somerset.		Roger of Salisbury (d. 1189), also called Roger the Great	108
Rochester, Sir Robert (1494?-1557)	72	Roger Pauper (fl. 1180). See under Roger of Salisbury.
Rochester, Solomon de (d. 1204)	78	Roger of Ford (fl. 1170), called also Roger Gustun, Gustum, and Roger of Citeaux	106
Rochford, Earls of. See Znylestein, William Henry, first Earl, 1845-1700; Znylestein, William Henry, fourth Earl, 1717-1781.		Roger of Hereford (fl. 1178)	107
Rochford, Viscount. See Boleyn, George (d. 1585).		Roger (d. 1179)	107
Rochford, Sir John de (fl. 1390-1410)	74	Roger of Pont l'Évêque (d. 1181)	109
Rochford, Robert (1652-1727)	74	Roger of Hoveden or Howden (d. 1201?). See Hoveden.
Rochford, Simon (d. 1224)	75	Roger (d. 1202)	111
Rock, Daniel, D.D. (1799-1871)	75	Roger of Croiland (d. 1214?)	112
Rothingham, second Marquis of. See Watson-Wentworth, Charles (1780-1782).		Roger de Wendover (d. 1286). See Wendover.
Rothingham, first Baron. See Watson, Sir Lewis (1664-1658).		Roger de Wesham or Wessham (d. 1257). See Wesham.
Rodkay, Edmund (d. 1597)	76	Roger de Thurkilbi (d. 1260). See Thurkilbi.
Rodkato, William Smith (1828-1895)	76	Roger de Leybourne (d. 1271). See Leybourne.
Rodd, Edward Hearle (1810-1880)	77	Roger of Waltham (d. 1385)	112
Rodd, Horatio (fl. 1859). See under Rodd, Thomas, the elder.		Roger of Chester (fl. 1389). See Chester.
Rodd, Thomas, the elder (1768-1822)	78	Roger of St. Albans (fl. 1450)	113
Rodd, Thomas, the younger (1798-1849). See under Rodd, Thomas, the elder.		Rogers, Benjamin (1814-1698)	113
Roddam, Robert (1710-1808)	79	Rogers, Charles (1711-1784)	114
Roden, Earls of. See Jocelyn, Robert, first Earl, 1781-1797; Jocelyn, Robert, third Earl, 1798-1870.		Rogers, Charles (1825-1890)	115
Roden, William Thomas (1817-1892)	79	Rogers, Daniel (1588?-1591)	116
Roderic the Great (d. 877). See Rhodri Mawr.		Rogers, Daniel (1578-1652)	117
Roderic O'Connor (1116-1198). See O'Connor.		Rogers, Sir Edward (1498?-1587?)	118
Roderick, Richard (d. 1766)	80	Rogers, Ezekiel (1684?-1661)	119
Rodes, Francis (1580?-1588)	80	Rogers, Francis James Newman (1791-1851)	119
Rodger, Alexander (1784-1845)	80	Rogers, Frederic, Baron Blachford (1811-1889)	119
Rodington, John (d. 1848)	81	Rogers, George, M.D. (1618-1697)	120
Rodney, George Brydges, first Baron Rodney (1719-1792)	81	Rogers, Henry (1585?-1658)	121
Rodney, John (1765-1847). See under Rodney, George Brydges, first Baron Rodney.		Rogers, Henry (1806-1877)	121
Rodwell, George Herbert Buonaparte (1800-1852)	87	Rogers, Isaac (1754-1839)	122
Roe, George Hamilton (1795-1878)	88	Rogers, James Edwin Thorold (1828-1890)	122
Roe, John Septimus (1797-1878)	88	Rogers, John (1500?-1555)	125
Roe, Richard (d. 1858)	89	Rogers, John (1540?-1608?). See under
Roe, Sir Thomas (1581?-1644)	89	Rogers, John (1500?-1555).
Roebuck, John, M.D. (1718-1794)	98	Rogers, John (1573?-1686)	129
Roebuck, John Arthur (1801-1879)	95	Rogers, John (1627-1656?)	130
Roebuck, Thomas (1781-1819)	97	Rogers, John (1610-1680)	132
		Rogers, John (1680-1684). See under Rogers, Nathaniel.
		Rogers, John (1679-1729)	138
		Rogers, John (1740?-1814)	138
		Rogers, John (1778-1856)	134
		Rogers, Joseph (1821-1889). See under Rogers, James Edwin Thorold.
		Rogers, Josias (1755-1795)	134

Index to Volume XVII.

1399

	PAGE		PAGE
Rogers, Nathaniel (1598-1655)	185	Romilly, Joseph (1791-1864)	167
Rogers, Nehemiah (1598-1660)	186	Romilly, Sir Samuel (1757-1818)	188
Rogers, Philip Hutchings (1786?-1853)	137	Romney, Earl of. See Sidney, Henry (1841-1704).
Rogers, Richard (1682?-1507)	187	Romney, George (1734-1803)	191
Rogers, Richard (1550?-1618)	186	Romney, John (1758-1632). See under Romney, George.
Rogers, Robert (1737-1800)	188	Romney, John (1768-1863)	200
Rogers, Samuel (1768-1855)	189	Romney, Peter (1743-1777)	200
Rogers, Thomas (d. 1616)	142	Romney, Sir William (d. 1811)	200
Rogers, Thomas (1680-1694)	148	Ronalds, Edmund (1619-1869)	201
Rogers, Thomas (1760-1662)	144	Ronalds, Sir Francis (1788-1873)	201
Rogers, Timothy (1689-1650?)	144	Ronsyns, Joseph Philip (1822-1376)	204
Rogers, Timothy (1658-1728)	144	Rooke, Sir George (1650-1709)	204
Rogers, William (fl. 1580-1610)	145	Rooke, Sir Giles (1743-1806)	208
Rogers, William (1819-1896)	145	Rooke, John (1780-1856)	208
Rogers, William Gibbs (1792-1875)	146	Rooke, Lawrence (1622-1682)	209
Rogers, Woodes (d. 1782)	147	Rooke, William Michael (1794-1647)	210
Rogerson, John Bolton (1808-1859)	146	Rooker, Edward (1713?-1774)	210
Roget, Peter Mark (1779-1869)	140	Rooker, Michael, commonly called Michael Angelo Rooker (1748-1601)	211
Rokeby, Barons. See Robinson, Richard, first Baron, 1709-1794; Robinson-Morris, Matthew, second Baron, 1718-1800.		Rookwood or Rokewode, Ambrose (1576?-1606)	211
Rokeby, John (d. 1573?).	151	Rookwood, Ambrose (1664-1696). See under Rookwood or Rokewode, Ambrose.
Rokeby, Ralph (d. 1575). See under Rokeby, Ralph (1527?-1596).		Room, Henry (1802-1850)	212
Rokeby, Ralph (1527?-1596)	152	Roome, Edward (d. 1729)	212
Rokeby, Sir Thomas de (d. 1856)	152	Rosa. See Ros.
Rokeby, Thomas de (d. 1418). See under Rokeby, Sir Thomas de (d. 1356).		Roth, David (1573-1650). See Roth.
Rokeby, Sir Thomas (1661?-1699)	153	Roper, Abel (1665-1728)	213
Rokeby, William (d. 1621)	154	Roper, Margaret (1605-1544). See under More, Sir Thomas, and Roper, William.
Rokesley, Gregory de (d. 1391)	155	Roper, Roper Stote Donnison (1771-1828?)	214
Rokewode, Ambrose (1576?-1606). See Rookwood.		Roper, Samuel (d. 1658)	215
Rokewode, John Gage (1766-1842)	156	Roper, William (1496-1578)	215
Rolfe, John (1585-1622)	157	Rory or Rory Oge (d. 1578). See O'More, Rory.
Rolfe, Robert Moseley, Baron Cranworth (1790-1868)	158	Rory O'Mors (fl. 1620-1652). See O'More, Rory.
Rolland, John (fl. 1550)	161	Ros or Roos of Hamlake, Lord. See Manners, Thomas, afterwards first Earl of Rutland (d. 1543).
Rolla, Henry (1589?-1656)	162	Ros or Rosse, John de (d. 1892)	216
Rolla, John (1598-1648)	166	Ros, John de, Baron Ros (d. 1888). See under Ros, William de, second Baron Ros.
Rolle, John, Baron Rolle of Stevenstone (1750-1842)	166
Rolle, Richard de Hampole (1290?-1849)	164
Rolle or Rolis, Samuel (fl. 1657-1878)	167
Rolleston, George (1829-1881)	167
Rollo, Andrew, fifth Lord Rollo (1700-1765)	169
Rollo, John, M.D. (d. 1809)	169
Rollo, sometimes called Rollock, Sir Willm (d. 1645)
Rollock, Hercules (fl. 1577-1619)
Rollock, Peter (d. 1626?)
Rollock or Rollock, Robert (1555?-1500)
Rolph, John (1706-1870)
Rolt, Sir John (1804-1871)
Rolt, Richard (1726?-1770)
Romaine, William (1714-1795)
Romaine, William Govett (1815-1898)
Romanes, George John (1648-1894)
Romans, Bernard (1720?-1784?)
Romanus (fl. 624)	181
Romanus, John (d. 1255). See under Romanus or Le Romeyn, John.
Romanus or Le Romeyn, John (d. 1296)	161
Romer, Emma, afterwards Mrs. Almond (1814-1868)	166
Romer, Isabella Frances (d. 1852)	164
Romer, John Lambertus (1680-1754?). See under Romer, Wolfgang William.
Romer, Wolfgang William (1640-1719)	164
Romilly, Hugh Hastings (1856-1892)	166
Romilly, John, first Lord Romilly (1802-1874)	180
		Ross or Ross, Alexander (1021?-1120). See Ross.
		Ross, Caleb Burrell (1790-1872)	226
		Rose, George (1744-1818)	226
		Rose, Sir George (1762-1876)	230
		Rose, George (1817-1882)	230
		Rose, Sir George Henry (1771-1855)	231
		Rose, Henry John (1800-1878)	232
		Rose, Hugh Henry, Baron Strathnairn of Strathnairn and Jausi (1801-1865)	233

	PAGE		PAGE
Rose, Hugh James (1795-1888) . . . . .	240	Rossetti, Maria Françoese (1827-1876). See under Rossetti, Christina Georgina.
Rose, Hugh James (1840-1878). See under Rose, Henry John.		Rossi, John Charles Felix (1782-1889) . . . . .	230
Rose, John (?) Augustus or Auguste (1757-1841) . . . . .	242	Rosslyn, Earls of. See Wedderburn, Alexander, first Earl, 1788-1808; Erskine, Sir James St. Clair, second Earl, 1762-1837.
Rose, Sir John (1820-1888) . . . . .	242	Roat, Reinhold (1822-1896) . . . . .	280
Rose, Samuel (1767-1804) . . . . .	243	Rosworms or Rosworm, John (fl. 1080-1060) . . . . .	261
Rose, William (1719-1788). See under Rose, Samuel.		Rotelands, Hue de, or Rutland, Hugh of (fl. 1185) . . . . .	268
Rose, William Stewart (1775-1848) . . . . .	244	Rotha, Bernard (1695-1768). See Routh.
Rosebery, Earls of. See Primrose, Archibald, first Earl, 1661-1728; Primrose, Archibald John, fourth Earl, 1788-1888.		Rotha or Roth, David (1578-1650) . . . . .	263
Roseingrave, Daniel (1855?-1727) . . . . .	245	Rotha, Michael (1061-1741) . . . . .	266
Roseingrave, Ralph (1895-1747). See under Roseingrave, Daniel.		Rotha, Robert (1550-1622) . . . . .	267
Roseingrave, Thomas (1690?-1755?). See under Roseingrave, Daniel.		Rotheram, Caleb, D.D. (1694-1752) . . . . .	268
Rosen, Friedrich August (1805-1887) . . . . .	247	Rotheram, Edward (1758?-1880) . . . . .	268
Rosenberg, George Frederic (1825-1809) . . . . .	247	Rotheram, John (1726-1789) . . . . .	269
Rosenhagen, Philip (1787?-1798) . . . . .	248	Rotheram, John (1750?-1804) . . . . .	269
Rosewell, Samuel (1679-1722) . . . . .	249	Rotherham, Sir John (1680-1696?) . . . . .	300
Rosewell, Thomas (1680-1692) . . . . .	249	Rotherham, Thomas (1428-1500), otherwise known as Thomas Scot . . . . .	301
Rossier, James (1575-1685) . . . . .	251	Rothery, Henry Cadogan (1817-1888) . . . . .	308
Ross, Duke of. See Stewart, James (1476?-1504).		Rothery, William (1778-1864). See under Rothery, Henry Cadogan.
Ross, Earls of. See Macdonald, Donald, ninth Earl, d. 1430?; Macdonald, Alexander, tenth Earl, d. 1449; Macdonald, John, eleventh Earl, d. 1498?		Rothas, Duke of. See Leslie, John (1880-1681).
Ross, Mother (1807-1789). See Davies, Christian.		Rothas, Earls of. See Leslie, George, fourth Earl, d. 1558; Leslie, Andrew, fifth Earl, d. 1611; Leslie, John, sixth Earl, 1600-1641; Leslie, John, seventh Earl and first Duke, 1680-1681; Leslie, John, eighth Earl, 1870-1722; Leslie, John, ninth Earl, 1696?-1767.
Ross, Alexander (1591-1654) . . . . .	251	Rothas, Master of. See Leslie, Norman (d. 1554).
Ross or Rose, Alexander (1647?-1720) . . . . .	252	Rothsay, Duke of. See Stewart, David (1878?-1409).
Ross, Alexander (1699-1784) . . . . .	254	Rothschild, Sir Anthony de (1810-1876). See under Rothschild, Nathan Meyer.
Ross, Alexander (1742-1827) . . . . .	255	Rothschild, Lionel Nathan de (1808-1879) . . . . .	604
Ross, Alexander (1788-1856) . . . . .	256	Rothschild, Meyer Amschel de (1818-1874), known as Baron Meyer. See under Rothschild, Nathan Meyer.
Ross, Andrew (1778-1812) . . . . .	257	Rothschild, Nathan Meyer (1777-1830) . . . . .	306
Ross, Arthur (d. 1704) . . . . .	257	Rothwell, Edward (d. 1781) . . . . .	309
Ross, David (1728-1790) . . . . .	259	Rothwell, Richard (1800-1868) . . . . .	310
Ross, George (1614-1668) . . . . .	260	Rotier. See Roettier.
Ross, Sir Hew Dalrymple (1779-1868) . . . . .	261	Roubillac or Roubillac, Louis François (1695-1762) . . . . .	310
Ross, Horatio (1801-1888) . . . . .	264	Rouliffe, Sir Brian (d. 1494) . . . . .	312
Ross, James (1885-1871). See under Rosa, Alexander (1788-1850).		Rough. See also Row.
Ross, James, M.D. (1837-1899) . . . . .	265	Rough, John (d. 1557) . . . . .	318
Rose, Sir James Clark (1800-1862) . . . . .	265	Rough, William (d. 1886) . . . . .	318
Ross, John (1411?-1491). See Rous.		Rounare, William de, Earl of Lincoln (fl. 1140) . . . . .	314
Ross or Rosas, John (1719-1792) . . . . .	268	Roupell, George Leith, M.D. (1797-1854) . . . . .	315
Ross, John (1768-1837) . . . . .	267	Rous, Francis (1579-1659) . . . . .	316
Ross, Sir John (1777-1856) . . . . .	267	Rous, Henry John (1796-1877) . . . . .	317
Rose, John (1800?-1865?). See Dix.		Rous or Ross, John (1411?-1491) . . . . .	318
Ross, Sir John Lockhart (1721-1790) . . . . .	269	Rous, John (1584-1644) . . . . .	320
Rose, John Merry (1839-1889) . . . . .	271	Rous, John (fl. 1056-1095) . . . . .	320
Ross, John Wilson (1818-1867) . . . . .	271	Rousby, Clara Marion Jessie (1852?-1879) . . . . .	321
Ross, Patrick (1740?-1804) . . . . .	272	Rouse or Russe, John (1574-1652) . . . . .	322
Ross, Robert (1766-1814) . . . . .	274	Rousseau, Jacques (1696-1894) . . . . .	322
Ross, Sir Robert Dalrymple (1828-1887) . . . . .	277	Rousseau, Samuel (1768-1820) . . . . .	323
Ross, Thomas (1575?-1618) . . . . .	278	Rousseau, Theodore (1614-1686). See Russel.
Ross, Thomas (d. 1675) . . . . .	278	Routh, Bernard (1695-1768) . . . . .	323
Ross, William, twelfth Lord Ross of Hawkhead (1656?-1788) . . . . .	279	Routh, Mrs. Martha (1743-1817) . . . . .	324
Ross, William (1762-1790) . . . . .	280	Routh, Martin Joseph (1755-1854) . . . . .	324
Ross, Sir William Charles (1794-1880) . . . . .	260	Routh, Sir Randolph Isham (1785?-1858) . . . . .	326
Rosse, Earls of. See Parsons, Lawrence, second Earl, 1758-1841; Parsons, William, third Earl, 1800-1867.		Routledge, George (1812-1888) . . . . .	326
Rosse, John de (d. 1882). See Ros.		Row. See also Rough.
Rosseter, Philip (1575?-1628) . . . . .	282
Rossetti, Christina Georgina (1880-1894) . . . . .	282
Rossetti, Dante Gabriel (1828-1882) . . . . .	284
Rossetti, Lucy Madox (1849-1894) . . . . .	289

Index to Volume XVII.

1401

	PAGE
Row, John (1625 ?-1580) . . . . .	327
Row, John (1668-1848) . . . . .	329
Row, John (1698 ?-1672 ?) . . . . .	330
Row, Thomas (1738-1864) . . . . .	331
Row, William (1663-1634) . . . . .	331
Rowan, Archibald Hamilton (1751-1834) . . . . .	332
Rowan, Arthur Blennerhassett, D.D. (1800-1861) . . . . .	333
Rowan, Sir Charles (1782 ?-1852) . . . . .	333
Rowan, Frederica Maclean (1814-1882) . . . . .	336
Rowan, Gavin William Rowan Hamilton (1738-1834). See under Rowan, Archibald Hamilton.
Rowan, Sir William (1789-1879) . . . . .	336
Rowbotham, Thomas Charles Leeson (1823-1875) . . . . .	337
Rowe. See also Row.
Rowe, Beuom (1653-1706). See under Rowe, Thomas (1657-1705).
Rowe, Mrs. Elizabeth (1671-1737) . . . . .	338
Rowe, George Robert (1792-1861) . . . . .	339
Rowe, Harry (1726-1800) . . . . .	339
Rowe, John (1826-1677) . . . . .	340
Rowe, John (1784-1882) . . . . .	341
Rowe, Nicholas (1874-1718) . . . . .	341
Rowe or Roe, Owen (1693 ?-1861) . . . . .	343
Rowe, Richard (1828-1879) . . . . .	343
Rowe, Samuel (1798-1858) . . . . .	343
Rowe, Sir Samuel (1835-1888) . . . . .	347
Rowe, Thomas (1657-1705) . . . . .	347
Rowe, Thomas (1887-1715). See under Rowe, Mrs. Elizabeth.
Rowell, George Augustus (1804-1892) . . . . .	348
Rowland. See also Rowlands.
Rowland, Daniel (1778-1859) . . . . .	349
Rowland, David (fl. 1560-1538) . . . . .	349
Rowland, John (1608-1800) . . . . .	349
Rowlands, Daniel (1718-1700) . . . . .	350
Rowlands, Henry (1561-1610) . . . . .	351
Rowlands, Henry (1655-1723) . . . . .	351
Rowlands alias Versteegen, Richard (fl. 1565-1630) . . . . .	352
Rowlands, Samuel (1570 ?-1630 ?) . . . . .	352
Rowlands, William (1802-1865), known as Gwilym Llyen . . . . .	353
Rowlandson, Mary (fl. 1682) . . . . .	357
Rowlandson, Thomas (1758-1827) . . . . .	357
Rowley, Sir Charles (1770-1845) . . . . .	359
Rowley, John (1763 ?-1834) . . . . .	359
Rowley, Sir Joshua (1780 ?-1790) . . . . .	360
Rowley, Sir Josias (1765-1842) . . . . .	361
Rowley, Samuel (d. 1638 ?) . . . . .	362
Rowley, Thomas (pseudonym). See Chatterton, Thomas (1752-1770).
Rowley, William (1585 ?-1612 ?) . . . . .	363
Rowley, Sir William (1690 ?-1768) . . . . .	365
Rowley, William (1742-1806) . . . . .	366
Rowning, John (1701 ?-1771) . . . . .	367
Rowntree, Joseph (1801-1859) . . . . .	367
Rowse, Richard (fl. 1250). See Richard of Cornwall.
Rowson, Susanna (1762-1824) . . . . .	367
Rowthall, Thomas (d. 1528). See Rudhall.
Roxburgh, Dukes of. See Ker, John, first Duke, d. 1741; Ker, John, third Duke, 1740-1804; Ker, James Innes, fifth Duke, 1738-1823.
Roxburgh, Earl of. See Ker, Robert, first Earl (1670 ?-1650).
Roxburgh, William (1751-1815) . . . . .	368
Roxby, Robert (1800 ?-1866) . . . . .	370
Roy, John (1700-1752). See Stewart, John.
Roy, William (fl. 1527) . . . . .	370
Roy, William (1728-1790) . . . . .	371
Rydon, Sir Marmaduke (1564-1614) . . . . .	372
Rydon, Matthew (fl. 1580-1622) . . . . .	374
Roy, John Forbes (1790-1858) . . . . .	375
Rovston, Richard (1593-1686) . . . . .	376
Ruadhan (d. 525 ?) . . . . .	378
Rud, Thomas (1668-1733) . . . . .	377
Rudborne or Rodelburne, Thomas (d. 1412) . . . . .	377
Rudborne, Thomas (fl. 1460) . . . . .	378
Rudd, Anthony (1540 ?-1615) . . . . .	378
Rudd, Sayer (d. 1737) . . . . .	379
Rudd, Thomas (1584 ?-1656) . . . . .	380
Rudder, Samuel (d. 1801) . . . . .	380
Ruddiman, Thomas (1674-1757) . . . . .	381
Rudge, Edward (1763-1846) . . . . .	383
Rudge, Edward John (1792-1861). See under Rudge, Edward.
Rudge, Thomas (1754-1825) . . . . .	384
Rudhall, Abraham, the younger (1650-1785). See under Rudhall, Abraham, the elder.
Rudhall, Abraham, the elder (1037-1736) . . . . .	384
Ruding, Rogers (1751-1820) . . . . .	385
Rudyard, Sir Benjamin (1572-1658) . . . . .	385
Rue, Warren de la (1815-1889) . . . . .	387
Ruff, William (1801-1856) . . . . .	389
Ruffhead, Owen (1723-1769) . . . . .	389
Rufus (d. 1128). See Belmeis or Beaumeis, Richard.
Rufus, Geoffrey (d. 1140) . . . . .	390
Rufus, Richard (fl. 1250). See Richard of Cornwall.
Rugg or Reppes, William (d. 1550) . . . . .	390
Rugge, Robert (d. 1410). See Rygge.
Rugge, Thomas (d. 1873 ?) . . . . .	391
Ruggle, George (1575-1623) . . . . .	392
Ruggles, Thomas (1737 ?-1818) . . . . .	393
Ruglen, Earl of. See Douglas, William, third Earl of Maich and fourth Duke of Queensberry (1724-1810).
Rule, Samt (fl. 8th cent. ?). See Regulus.
Rule, Gilbert, M.D. (1820 ?-1701) . . . . .	393
Rule, William Harris (1802-1890) . . . . .	394
Rumbold, Sir Arthur Carlos Henry (1820-1860). See under Rumbold, Sir George Barriman.
Rumbold, Sir George Barriman (1784-1807) . . . . .	395
Rumbold, Henry (1617-1699). See under Rumbold, William.
Rumbold, Richard (1822 ?-1685) . . . . .	398
Rumbold, Sir Thomas (1758-1791) . . . . .	397
Rumbold, William (1818-1687) . . . . .	399
Rumford, Count von. See Thompson, Sir Benjamin (1753-1814).
Rumold, in Irish Ruthmael (d. 775 ?) . . . . .	400
Rumsey, Walter (1584-1660) . . . . .	401
Runciman, Alexander (1738-1785) . . . . .	401
Runciman, James (1832-1891) . . . . .	402
Runciman, John (1714-1736). See under Runciman, Alexander.
Rundell, Mary Ann (d. 1839) . . . . .	403
Rundell, Mrs. Maria Eliza (1745-1828) . . . . .	403
Rundle, Thomas (1688 ?-1748) . . . . .	403
Runnington, Charles (1751-1831) . . . . .	405
Rupert, Prince, Count Palatine of the Rhine and Duke of Bavaria, afterwards Duke of Cumberland and Earl of Holderness (1819-1682) . . . . .	405
Rupibus, Peter de (d. 1328). See Peter des Roobas.
Rush, Anthony (1567-1577) . . . . .	417

	PAGE		PAGE
Rush, James Blomfield ( d. 1849). See under Jermy, Isaac.		Russell, Samuel Thomas (1769?-1845)	471
Rushook, Thomas ( f. 1888)	417	Russell, Theodore (1614-1889). See Russell.
Rushout, Sir John (1884-1775)	418	Russell, Thomas (1762-1788)	473
Rushton, Edward (1650-1686). See Riehton.		Russell, Thomas (1777-1806)	478
Rushton, Edward (1756-1814)	419	Russell or Cloutt, Thomas (1781?-1848)	475
Rushton, Edward (1796-1861). See under Rushton, Edward (1756-1814).		Russell, Thomas Maonamara (1740?-1824)	475
Rushton, Edward (1796-1861)		Russell, Sir William, first Baron Russell of Thornhaugh (1558?-1816)	476
Rushworth, John (1812?-1600)	419	Russell, Sir William ( d. 1534)	479
Rushworth, John (1669-1766)	422	Russell, William, Lord Russell (1659-1805), 'the patriot'	480
Rushworth or Richworth, William ( d. 1687)	423	Russell, William, first Duke of Bedford (1618-1700)	485
Russel. See also Russell.		Russell, William (1741-1795)	487
Russel, Alexander (1814-1875)	425	Russell, William (1777-1818)	488
Russel, Antony (1656?-1745). See under Russell, Rousseel, or Russell, Theodore.		Russell, William (1740-1818)	488
Russel, George (1728-1767)	424	Russell, Sir William, M.D. (1778-1859). See under Russell, Sir William (1822-1892).
Russel, John (1740?-1817)	424	Russell, William (1780-1870). See under Russell, John (1745-1805).
Russel, Rousseel, or Russell, Theodore (1814-1889)	425	Russell, John (1745-1805)
Russel, William ( d. 1702)	425	Russell, Sir William (1822-1892)	489
Russell. See also Russel.		Russell, William Armstrong (1821-1879)	489
Russell, Alexander (1715?-1788)	426	Russell, Sir William Oldnall (1785-1886)	490
Russell, Arthur Tozer (1806-1874)	427	Russen, David ( f. 1705)	490
Russell, Sir Charles (1828-1888)	428	Rust, George ( d. 1870)	490
Russell, Charles William (1812-1880)	428	Rust, Cyprian Thomas (1808-1895)	491
Russell, Sir David (1800-1884)	428	Rustat, Tobias (1806?-1894)	491
Russell, Edward, Earl of Orford (1653-1727)	429	Ruthall or Rowthall, Thomas ( d. 1528)	492
Russell, Lord Edward (1805-1887)	481	Rutherford, Andrew, Earl of Teviot ( d. 1681)	495
Russell, Lady Elizabeth (1528-1609). See under Hoby, Sir Thomas.		Rutherford, Daniel (1749-1819)	494
Russell, Francois, second Earl of Bedford (1527?-1585)	481	Rutherford, John ( d. 1577)	495
Russell, Francois, fourth Earl of Bedford (1593-1841)	488	Rutherford, John (1695-1779)	495
Russell, Francis, fifth Duke of Bedford (1765-1802)	485	Rutherford, Samuel (1800?-1881)	498
Russell, Francis Charles Hastings, ninth Duke of Bedford (1819-1891). See under Russell, Lord George William.		Rutherford, William (1798?-1871)	498
Russell, Lord George William (1790-1848)	437	Rutherford, Thomas, D.D. (1712-1771)	499
Russell, Sir Henry (1751-1838)	438	Rutherford, Andrew, Lord Rutherford (1701-1854)	506
Russell, James (1754-1886)	439	Ruthven, Alexander (1580?-1800)	502
Russell, James (1786-1861)	440	Ruthven, Edward Southwell (1772-1886)	504
Russell, James (1790-1881)	441	Ruthven, John, third Earl of Gowrie (1578?-1600)	504
Russell, John ( f. 1450)	441	Ruthven, Patrick, third Lord Ruthven (1520?-1685)	509
Russell, Sir John ( f. 1440-1470)	441	Ruthven, Patrick, Earl of Forth and Bretonford (1575?-1651)	511
Russell, John ( d. 1494)	442	Ruthven, William, second Lord Ruthven ( d. 1552)	516
Russell, John, first Earl of Bedford (1485?-1555)	444	Ruthven, William, fourth Lord Ruthven and first Earl of Gowrie (1541?-1684)	514
Russell, John, fourth Duke of Bedford (1710-1771)	447	Rutland, Dukes of. See Manners, John, first Duke, 1888-1711; Manners, Charles, fourth Duke, 1754-1787; Manners, Charles Cecil John, sixth Duke, 1815-1888.
Russell, John (1745-1808)	452	Rutland, Earle of. See Manners, Thomas, first Earl, d. 1548; Manners, Henry, second Earl, d. 1588; Manners, Edward, third Earl, 1540-1587; Manners, Roger, fifth Earl, 1576-1812; Manners, Francis, sixth Earl, 1578-1682; Manners, John, eighth Earl, 1804-1879.
Russell, John, sixth Duke of Bedford (1755-1889). See under Russell, Lord John, first Earl Russell.		Rutland, Hugh of ( f. 1185) See Rotelands, Hue de.
Russell, John, D.D. (1787-1885)	454	Rutledge, James or John James (1748-1794)	518
Russell, John, Viscount Amberley (1842-1878)	454	Rutt, John Towill (1780-1841)	519
Russell, Lord John, first Earl Russell (1792-1878)	454	Rutter, John (1798-1851)	519
Russell, John (1795-1888)	454	Rutter, Joseph ( f. 1855)	520
Russell, John Fuller (1814-1884)	485	Rutty, John, M.D. (1698-1775)	520
Russell, John Scott (1808-1882)	485	Rutty, William, M.D. (1887-1780)	521
Russell, Joseph (1780-1846)	485	Ruvigny, Marquis de. See Maesne de Ruvigny, Henri de, second Marquis (1648-1720).
Russell, Lucy, Countess of Bedford ( d. 1827)	487	Ryall, Henry Thomas (1811-1867)	521
Russell, Michael (1781-1848)	487
Russell, Odo William Leopold, first Baron Amphil (1829-1884)	488
Russell, Patrick (1629-1692)	489
Russell, Patrick (1727-1805)	489
Russell, Rachel, Lady Russell (1688-1723). See under Russell, William, Lord Russell.
Russell, Richard, M.D. ( d. 1771)	470

Index to Volume XVII.

1403

	PAGE		PAGE
Ryan, Daniel Frederick (1762 ?-1798) . . .	522	Sacheverell, Henry (1674 ?-1724) . . .	569
Ryan, Edward, D.D. (d. 1619) . . .	528	Sacheverell, William (1638-1641) . . .	572
Ryan, Sir Edward (1798-1875) . . .	523	Sackville, Charles, sixth Earl of Dorset and Earl of Middlesex (1638-1708) . . .	575
Ryan, Laoy (1894 ?-1780) . . .	524	Sackville, Charles, second Duke of Dorset (1711-1780) . . .	577
Ryan, Michael (fl. 1890). See under Ryan, Michael (1800-1841).		Sackville, Sir Edward, fourth Earl of Dorset (1591-1832) . . .	578
Ryan, Michael (1800-1841) . . .	525	Sackville, George, first Viscount Sackville (1716-1785). See Germain, George Sackville.
Ryan, Michael Desmond (1816-1868) . . .	526	Sackville, John Frederick, third Duke of Dorset (1745-1799) . . .	581
Ryan, Richard (1796-1849) . . .	526	Sackville, Lionel Cranfield, first Duke of Dorset (1688-1765) . . .	581
Ryan, Vincent William (1816-1888) . . .	527	Sackville, Sir Richard (d. 1568) . . .	584
Rycaut or Ricaut, Sir Paul (1628-1700) . . .	527	Sackville, Richard, fifth Earl of Dorset (1622-1677). See under Sackville, Sir Edward, fourth Earl of Dorset.
Ryder. See also Rider.		Sackville, Robert, second Earl of Dorset (1561-1609) . . .	585
Ryder, Sir Alfred Philipps (1820-1888) . . .	529	Sackville, Thomas, first Earl of Dorset and Baron Buckhurst (1528-1608) . . .	585
Ryder, Sir Dudley (1691-1764) . . .	529	Sacrobosco, Christopher (1582-1616). See Holywood.
Ryder, Dudley, first Earl of Harrowby and Viscount Sandon, and second Baron Harrowby (1762-1847) . . .	561	Sacro Bosco, Johannes de (fl. 1280). See Holywood or Halifax, John.
Ryder, Dudley, second Earl of Harrowby (1798-1882) . . .	563	Saddington, John (1684 ?-1679) . . .	589
Ryder, Henry (1777-1836) . . .	584	Saddler, John (1812-1892) . . .	590
Ryder, John, D.D. (1697 ?-1775) . . .	588	Saddington, Sir Robert de (fl. 1340) . . .	590
Ryder, John (1814-1885) . . .	588	Sadler, Franc (1774-1851) . . .	591
Ryder, Nathaniel, first Baron Harrowby (1785-1803). See under Ryder, Sir Dudley.		Sadler, John (1814-1856) . . .	591
Ryder, Richard (1786-1839) . . .	587	Sadler, Anthony (fl. 1640). See under Sadler, Anthony (fl. 1680-1680).
Ryder, Thomas (1735-1790) . . .	588	Sadler, Anthony (fl. 1680-1680) . . .	592
Ryder, Thomas (1746-1810) . . .	589	Sadler, John (d. 1595 ?) . . .	596
Ryder or Rither, Sir William (1544 ?-1611) . . .	560	Sadler, John (1815-1674) . . .	596
Rye, Edward Caldwell (1882-1883) . . .	541	Sadler, Michael Forrebee (1819-1895) . . .	594
Ryerson, Egerton (1803-1862) . . .	541	Sadler, Michael Thomas (1780-1835) . . .	594
Ryerson, William (1791-1862). See under Ryerson, Egerton.		Sadler, Sadler, or Sadleyer, Sir Ralph (1507-1587) . . .	598
Rygge, Rigge, or Rugges, Robert (d. 1410) . . .	542	Sadler, Thomas, in religion Vincent Faustus (1604-1681) . . .	601
Ryland, Herman Wislous (1740-1838) . . .	543	Sadler, Thomas (fl. 1670-1700). See under Sadler, John (1815-1874).
Ryland, John (1717 ?-1798) . . .	544	Sadler, Thomas (1822-1891) . . .	601
Ryland, John (1756-1825) . . .	544	Sadler, Windham William (1798-1824) . . .	601
Ryland, John Collett (1726-1792) . . .	545	Saddington, Mark (d. 1647) . . .	602
Ryland, Jonathan Edwards (1798-1868) . . .	546	Saebbi (d. 695 ?). See Saebbi.
Ryland, William Wynne (1732-1768) . . .	547	Sælred (d. 748). See Sælred.
Rylands, John (1801-1888) . . .	548	Sawulf (fl. 1109) . . .	602
Rylands, Peter (1820-1887) . . .	549	Saffery, Mrs. Maria Grace (1772-1858) . . .	603
Ryley. See also Riley.		Saffold, Thomas (d. 1891) . . .	603
Ryley or Riley, Charles Reuben (1752 ?-1798) . . .	549	Safred (d. 1204). See Saffrid.
Ryley, John (1747-1815) . . .	550	Sage, John (1662-1711) . . .	604
Ryley, Philip (d. 1768). See under Ryley, William, the elder.		Saham, William de (d. 1804 ?) . . .	605
Ryley, Samuel William (1759-1887) . . .	550	Saimbel or Saint Bel, Charles Vial de (1758-1798) . . .	605
Ryley, William, the elder (d. 1867) . . .	552	Sainsbury, William Noel (1625-1695) . . .	606
Ryley, William (d. 1875). See under Ryley, William, the elder.		St. Albans, Duke of. See Beauchamp, Charles (1870-1726).
Rymar, James (fl. 1775-1822) . . .	554	St. Albans, Duchess of. See Mellon, Harriot (1777 ?-1887).
Rymar, Thomas (1641-1716) . . .	554	St. Albans, Earl of. See Jermyn, Henry (d. 1654).
Rysbrack, John Michael (Joannes Michiel) (1693 ?-1770) . . .	557	St. Albans, Viscount. See Bacon, Francis (1551-1626).
Ryther, Augustine (fl. 1576-1599) . . .	558	St. Albans, Alexander of (1157-1217). See Neckam.
Ryther, John (1664 ?-1681) . . .	559	St. Albans, Roger of (fl. 1450). See Roger.
Ryther, John (d. 1794). See under Ryther, John (1684 ?-1681).		St. Albans, William of (fl. 1178). See William.
Ryves, Bruno (1598-1877) . . .	559
Ryves, Elizabeth (1760-1797) . . .	560
Ryves, George Frederick (1758-1828) . . .	561
Ryves, Mrs. Lavinia Janetta Horton de Serres (1797-1871). See under Serres, Mrs. Olivia.
Ryves, Sir Thomas (1668 ?-1652) . . .	561
Saberet or Saba (d. 616 ?). See Sebert.
Sabia, Francis (fl. 1595) . . .	563
Sabine, Sir Edward (1788-1888) . . .	563
Sabine, Joseph (1662 ?-1789) . . .	567
Sabine, Joseph (1770-1887) . . .	568
Sabran, Lewis (1652-1762) . . .	568

	PAGE		PAGE
St. Amand, Almaric de ( f. 1240). See under St. Amand, Almaric de, third Baron de St. Amand.		St. Leger, Sir Anthony (1496?-1550)	652
St. Amand, Almaric de, third Baron de St. Amand (1814?-1832)	607	St. Leger, Francis Barry Boyle (1790-1829)	656
St. Amand, James (1687-1754)	607	St. Leger, Sir Warham (1595?-1607)	656
St. André, Nathanael (1680-1778)	608	St. Leger, Sir Warham ( d. 1600). See under St. Leger, Sir Warham (1595?-1607).
St. Anbyrn, Miss Catherine, afterwarde becoming Mrs. Moleworth ( d. 1886)	609	St. Leger, Sir William ( d. 1842)	657
St. Anbyrn, Sir John (1808-1744)	609	Saint Leger or Salinger, William (1600-1665)	660
St. Anbyrn, Sir John (1758-1839)	610	St. Leonards, Baron. See Sngden, Edward Burtenshaw (1781-1875).
Saint-Charles, William of ( d. 1096). See Carilsf. St. Clair. See Sinolair.		St. Lifard, Gilbert of ( d. 1805). See Gilbert.
Sainte-Mère-Eglise, William of ( d. 1224). See William.		St. Liz, Simon de, Earl of Northampton ( d. 1109). See Senlie.
Saint-Evremond, Charles de Marguetel de Saint Denis, de (1818?-1708)	611	St. Lo, Edward (1682?-1720)	860
St. Faith's, Benedict of ( f. 1400). See under St. Faith's, John of.		St. Lo, George ( d. 1718)	861
St. Faith's, John of ( d. 1850)	618	St. Maur. See Seymour.
St. Faith's, Peter of ( d. 1452). See under St. Faith's, John of.		St. Molyns, Lord of. See Kavanagh, Cahir Mac Art ( d. 1554).
St. Faith's, Robert of ( d. 1088). See under St. Faith's, John of.		Sainton, Prosper Philippo Catherine (1813-1890)	861
St. Faith's, William of ( d. 1872). See under St. Faith's, John of.		Sainton-Dolby, Madame Charlotte Helen (1821-1885). See under Sainton, Prosper Philippo Catherine.
Saint-George, Sir Henry (1581-1844)	614	St. Paul, John de (1295?-1882)	862
Saint-George, Sir Henry, the younger (1825-1715). See under Saint-George, Sir Henry.		St. Quintin, Sir William (1660?-1728)	868
St. George, Sir John (1812-1801)	614	St. Victor, Richard of ( d. 1178?). See Richard.
Saint-George, Sir Richard ( d. 1885)	615	St. Vinosnt, Earl of. See Jarvis, John (1785-18--)
Saint-George, Sir Thomas (1815-1708). See under Saint-George, Sir Henry.		Saker, Edward (1861-1888)	884
Saint-German, Christopher (1400?-1540)	616	Saker, Horatio ( f. 1850). See under Saker, Edward.
St. Germans, third Earl of (1798-1877). See Elliot, Edward Granvills.		Sala, George Augustus Henry (1828-1896)	864
St. Giles, John of ( f. 1230). See John.		Salaberry, Charles Michel de (1778-1829)	667
St. Helens, Baron. See Fitzherbert, Alleyns (1768-1890).		Salcot, John ( d. 1557). See Cayton, John.
St. John, Bayls (1822-1859)	817	Sala, Floranta, Lady (1790-1855). See under Sala, Sir Robert Henry.
St. John, Charles George William (1800-1876)	817	Sala, George (1697?-1780)	668
Saint-John, Henry, Viscount Bolingbroke (1078-1761)	618	Sala, George Charliss (1706-1869). See under Sala, John.
St. John, Horace Stabbing Roscoe (1832-1888)	638	Sala, John (1758-1897)	670
St. John, James Augustus (1801-1875)	684	Sala, John Barnard (1770-1850). See under Sala, John.
Saint-John, John de ( d. 1802)	684	Sala, Sir Robert Henry (1782-1845)	670
St. John, John (1746-1708)	687	Sala-Barker, Lucy Elizabeth Drummond Davies (1841-1892)	678
St. John, Oliver, Viscount Grandison and Baron Tregoz (1559-1880)	687	Salisbury. See Salisbury.
St. John, Oliver (1808-1642). See under St. John, Oliver, fourth Baron St. John of Bletho and first Earl of Bolingbroke.		'Salisbury,' Robert of ( f. 1150). See Robert.
St. John, Oliver, fourth Baron St. John of Bletho and first Earl of Bolingbroke (1580?-1616)	680	Salgado, James ( f. 1880)	878
St. John, Oliver (1508?-1878)	640	Salisbury, Earls of. See Longospée, William de, first Earl of the Longespée family, d. 1228; Longaspée, William de, second Earl, 1212?-1250; Montacute, William de, first Earl of the Montacute family, 1801-1844; Montacute, William de, second Earl, 1828-1897; Montacute, John de, third Earl, 1850?-1400; Montacute, Thomas de, fourth Earl, 1868-1428; Neville, Richard, first Earl of the Neville family, 1400-1480; Neville, Richard, second Earl, 1428-1471; Cecil, Robert, first Earl of the Cecil family, 1568-1612; Cecil, James, third Earl, d. 1688; Cecil, James, fourth Earl, d. 1898.
St. John, Sir Oliver Beauchamp Coventry (1867-1891)	646	Salisbury, Countess of. See Pole, Margaret (1478-1541).
St. John, Percy Bolingbroke (1821-1839)	647	Salisbury, Knoll Robert Gibbon (1810-1890)	879
St. Lawrence, Sir Christopher, twentieth, or more properly eighth, Baron Howth ( d. 1589)	848	Salisbury or Salisbury, Henry (1501-1887?)	870
St. Lawrence, Sir Christopher, twenty-second, or more properly tenth, Baron Howth (1568?-1619)	649	Salisbury, John of ( d. 1180). See John.
St. Lawrence, Nicholas, sixteenth, or more properly fourth, Baron Howth ( d. 1528)	651	Salisbury, John (1500?-1578)	880
St. Lawrence, Sir Nicholas, twenty-first, or more properly ninth, Baron Howth (1550?-1607). See under St. Lawrence, Sir Christopher ( d. 1589).		Salisbury, John (1575-1625)	681
St. Lawrence, Robert, fifteenth, or more properly third, Baron Howth ( d. 1488)	652	Salisbury, John ( f. 1827). See under Salisbury, John (1575-1625).
		Salisbury, John ( f. 1005). See under Salisbury or Salbury, Thomas.

Index to Volume XVII.

1405

	PAGE		PAGE
Salisbury, Richard Anthony (1761-1829) . . . . .	681	Samuel, Edward (1874-1749) . . . . .	780
Salisbury, Roger of ( d. 1189). See Roger.		Samuel, George ( d. 1823 ?) . . . . .	786
Salisbury or Salesbury, Thomas (1555 ?-1586) . . . . .	688	Samuel, Richard ( f. 1770-1786) . . . . .	791
Salisbury or Salbarys, Thomas (1597 ?-1620 ?) . . . . .	684	Samuel, William ( f. 1551-1569) . . . . .	781
Salisbury, Salesbury, or Salusbury, Thomas ( d. 1648) . . . . .	684	Samways or Samwales, P- t -r, D.D. (1615-1634) . . . . .	781
Salisbury or Salesbury, William (1520 ?-1600 ?) . . . . .	687	Samwell, David ( d. 1790) . . . . .	782
Salisbury or Salesbury, William (1580 ?-1650 ?) . . . . .	689	Sancho, Ignatius (1729-1780) . . . . .	732
Salisbury, William ( d. 1823) . . . . .	690	Sancroft, William (1617-1695) . . . . .	738
Salkeld, John (1576-1860) . . . . .	690	Sanctofidensis, Johannes ( d. 1859). See St. Faith's, John of.
Salkeld, William (1871-1715) . . . . .	691	Sancto Francisco, Angelus A (1601-1678). See Angelus.
Sall, Andrew (1812-1882) . . . . .	691	Sancto Francisco, Bernard A (1628-1709). See Eyston, Bernard.
Salmon, Eliza (1787-1849) . . . . .	692	Sancto Germano, Johannes de ( f. 1170). See John.
Salmon, John ( d. 1825) . . . . .	691	Sandale, John de ( d. 1319) . . . . .	739
Salmon, John Drew (1802 ?-1859) . . . . .	695	Sanders, Thomas Collett (1825-1894) . . . . .	740
Salmon, Nathanael (1675-1742) . . . . .	695	Sandby, Paul (1725-1809) . . . . .	740
Salmon, Robert (1768-1821) . . . . .	696	Sandby, Thomas (1721-1793) . . . . .	743
Salmon, Thomas (1648-1706) . . . . .	697	Sandeman, Robert (1718-1771) . . . . .	741
Salmon, Thomas (1679-1767) . . . . .	698	Sandeman, Sir Robert Groves (1835-1892) . . . . .	745
Salmon, William (1844-1718) . . . . .	699	Sanders. See also Saunders.
Salmon, William ( f. 1745) . . . . .	699	Sanders alias Baines, Francis (1648-1710) . . . . .	740
Salomon, Johann Peter (1745-1815) . . . . .	700	Sanders, Francis Williams (1769-1881) . . . . .	747
Salomons, Sir David (1797-1878) . . . . .	701	Sanders, George (1774-1846) . . . . .	747
Salt, Henry (1780-1827) . . . . .	702	Sanders or Saunders, John (1750-1825) . . . . .	747
Salt, Samuel ( d. 1792) . . . . .	702	Sanders or Sander, Nicholas (1580 ?-1581) . . . . .	748
Salt, Sir Titus (1808-1878) . . . . .	703	Sanders, Robert (1737-1788) . . . . .	751
Salt, William (1805-1868) . . . . .	704	Sanders, William (1799-1876) . . . . .	751
Salter, James ( f. 1666). See under Salter, James (1656-1718 ?) . . . . .	705	Sanders, William Rutherford (1828-1881) . . . . .	752
Salter, James (1656-1718 ?) . . . . .	705	Sanderson, James (1760 ?-1841 ?) . . . . .	753
Salter, James ( f. 1728) . . . . .	706	Sanderson, John, D.D. ( d. 1662) . . . . .	753
Salter, James ( d. 1787). See under Salter, James (1656-1718 ?) . . . . .	700	Sanderson, Robert (1587-1668) . . . . .	754
Salter, John William (1820-1869) . . . . .	700	Sanderson, Robert (1660-1741) . . . . .	755
Salter, Samuel ( d. 1756 ?). See under Salter, Samuel ( d. 1778) . . . . .	706	Sanderson, Thomas (1759-1829) . . . . .	756
Salter, Samuel ( d. 1778) . . . . .	706	Sanderson, Sir William (1686 ?-1676) . . . . .	757
Salter, Thomas ( f. 1586) . . . . .	707	Sandford. See also Sanford.
Salter, Thomas Frederick ( f. 1814-1826) . . . . .	708	Sandford, Daniel (1766-1880) . . . . .	757
Salter, William (1864-1875) . . . . .	708	Sandford, Sir Daniel Keyts (1798-1888) . . . . .	758
Salthouse, Thomas (1830-1691) . . . . .	708	Sandford, Francis (1680-1694) . . . . .	759
Saltmarsh, John ( d. 1847) . . . . .	709	Sandford, Francis Richard John, first Lord Sandford (1824-1898) . . . . .	766
Saltonstall, Charles ( f. 1642) . . . . .	711	Sandford, Fulk de ( d. 1271), also called Fulk de Bassei . . . . .	780
Saltonstall, Sir Richard (1521 ?-1801) . . . . .	712	Sandford, Sir Herbert Bruce (1826-1892). See under Sandford, Sir Daniel Keyte.
Saltonstall, Richard (1586-1658) . . . . .	712	Sandford or Sanford, James ( f. 1557) . . . . .	781
Saltonstall, Wys ( f. 1680-1640) . . . . .	718	Sandford, Saunford, or Sampford, John de ( d. 1294) . . . . .	782
Saltoun, sixteenth Lord. See Fraser, Alexander George (1785-1858) . . . . .		Sandford or Sanford, John (1565 ?-1629) . . . . .	764
Saltrey, Henry of ( f. 1150). See Henry.		Sandford, John (1801-1878) . . . . .	784
Saltwood, Robert ( f. 1646) . . . . .	714	Sandford, Samuel ( f. 1699) . . . . .	785
Salusbury. See Salisbury.		Sandhurst, Lord. See Mansfield, William Ross (1819-1876) . . . . .
Salvayn, Sir Gerard ( d. 1820) . . . . .	714	Sandilands, James, first Lord Torphichen ( d. 1579) . . . . .	787
Salvin, Anthony (1799-1881) . . . . .	711	Sandilands, James, seventh Lord Torphichen ( d. 1758) . . . . .	768
Salvey, Humphrey (1575 ?-1652). See under Salvey, Richard.		Sandsbury or Sansbury, John (1576-1610) . . . . .	768
Salvey, Richard (1815-1686) . . . . .	715	Sandwich, Earls of. See Montagu, Edward, first Earl, 1625-1672; Montagu, John, fourth Earl, 1718-1792.
Samble, Richard (1844-1886) . . . . .	717	Sandwich, Henry de ( d. 1278) . . . . .	768
Samelson, Adolph (1817-1888) . . . . .	717	Sandwich, Ralph de ( d. 1808 ?) . . . . .	769
Sammes, Aylett (1686 ?-1679 ?) . . . . .	718	Sandwith, Humphry (1822-1881) . . . . .	770
Sampson. See also Samson.		Sandys, Charles (1786-1859) . . . . .	772
Sampson, Henry (1829 ?-1700) . . . . .	718	Sandys, Edwin (1618 ?-1688) . . . . .	772
Sampson, Henry (1841-1891) . . . . .	719	Sandys, Sir Edwin (1861-1892) . . . . .	775
Sampson, Richard ( d. 1554) . . . . .	720	Sandys, George (1578-1644) . . . . .	779
Sampson, Thomas (1517 ?-1589) . . . . .	721	Sandys, Samuel, first Baron Sandys of Ombersley (1605 ?-1770) . . . . .	782
Sampson, William (1590 ?-1636 ?) . . . . .	722
Sampson, William (1704-1886) . . . . .	722
Sams, Joseph (1784-1860) . . . . .	726
Samson ( f. 1550) . . . . .	726
Samson ( d. 1112) . . . . .	727
Samson (1185-1211) . . . . .	727
Samuda, Joseph d'Aguilar (1818-1885) . . . . .	729

	PAGE		PAGE
Sandys, William, Baron Sandys of 'The Vyne' (d. 1846) . . . . .	784	Saunders or Sanders, Richard (1618-1687?) . . . . .	817
Sandys, William (1792-1874) . . . . .	785	Saunders, Richard Huok- (1720-1785) . . . . .	818
Sanford. See also Sandford.		Saunders, Thomas William (1814-1860) . . . . .	818
Sanford, John Langton (1824-1877) . . . . .	785	Saunders, William, M.D. (1748-1817) . . . . .	819
Sanford or Sandford, Joseph (d. 1774) . . . . .	785	Saunders, William (1828-1895) . . . . .	820
Sangar, Gabriel (d. 1878) . . . . .	786	Saunders, William Wilson (1809-1879) . . . . .	820
Sanger, John (1816-1889) . . . . .	786	Saunderson, Mrs. (d. 1711). See under Betterton, Thomas.
Sangster, Samuel (1864?-1872) . . . . .	787	Saunderson or Sanderson, Nicholas (1682-1739) . . . . .	821
Sanquhar, sixth Lord. See Crochton, Robert (d. 1812).		Saunford. See Sandford.
Sansetun, Benedict of (d. 1226) . . . . .	787	Saurin, William (1757?-1829) . . . . .	822
Sansum, Robert (d. 1665) . . . . .	787	Sautre, William (d. 1401). See Sawtrey.
Santlow, Hester (fl. 1726-1778). See under Booth, Barton.		Savage, Sir Arnold (d. 1755). See under Savage, Sir Arnold (d. 1410).
Santry, Lord. See Barry, James (1608-1672).		Savage, Sir Arnold (d. 1410) . . . . .	824
Saphir, Adolph (1881-1891) . . . . .	788	Savage, Henry, D.D. (1604?-1672) . . . . .	825
Sapiens, Bernard (fl. 865). See Barnard.		Savage, James (1767-1845) . . . . .	826
Saravia, Hadrian d. (1591-1818) . . . . .	788	Savage, James (1779-1852) . . . . .	827
Sargent, William Lucas (1809-1889) . . . . .	790	Savage, Sir John (d. 1492) . . . . .	827
Sargent, John (1786-1888) . . . . .	790	Savago, John (d. 1586) . . . . .	828
Sargent, John Grant (1818-1883) . . . . .	791	Savage, John (fl. 1696-1766) . . . . .	828
Sargent, John Neptune (1826-1892) . . . . .	792	Savage, John (1678-1747) . . . . .	829
Saris, John (d. 1640) . . . . .	798	Savage, John (1822-1888) . . . . .	836
Sarjeant, John (1622-1707). See Sergeant.		Savage, Sir John Boscowan (1760-1848) . . . . .	836
Sarmento, Jacob de Castro, M.D. (1692-1762) . . . . .	794	Savage, Marmion W. (1868-1872) . . . . .	861
Sarsfield, Patrick, titular Earl of Lucan (d. 1698) . . . . .	794	Savage, Richard, fourth Earl Rivers (1660?-1712) . . . . .	881
Sartoris, Mrs. Adelaide (1814?-1879). See Kemble.		Savage, Richard (d. 1748) . . . . .	834
Sartorius, Francois (1784-1804). See under Sartorius, John.		Savage, Sir Roland (d. 1519) . . . . .	837
Sartorius, Sir George Rose (1790-1895) . . . . .	797	Savage, Samuel Morton (1721-1791) . . . . .	838
Sartorius, John (1700?-1780?) . . . . .	798	Savage, Thomas (d. 1507) . . . . .	839
Sartorius, John F. (1775?-1831?). See under Sartorius, John.		Savage, Thomas (fl. 1020). See under Savage, Thomas (1808-1682).
Sartorius, John N. (1755?-1828?). See under Sartorius, John.		Savage, Thomas (1808-1682) . . . . .	839
Sass, Henry (1788-1844) . . . . .	799	Savage, William (d. 1788). See under Savage, John (1678-1747).
Sass or Saase, Richard (1774-1849). See under Sass, Henry.		Savage, William (1770-1848) . . . . .	840
Sassoon, Sir Albert Abdullah David (1818-1898) . . . . .	800	Savario (d. 1205) . . . . .	840
Satchwell, Benjamin (1782-1809) . . . . .	801	Savery, Thomas (1650?-1715) . . . . .	848
Saul, Arthur (d. 1585) . . . . .	802	Savile, Bouchier Wrey (1817-1888) . . . . .	844
Saul, Arthur (fl. 1614). See under Saul, Arthur (d. 1585).		Savile, Sir George, Marquis of Halifax (1688-1895) . . . . .	845
Saul, William Devonshire (1784-1855) . . . . .	802	Savile, Sir George (1726-1784) . . . . .	856
Saul, Richard (d. 1702) . . . . .	802	Savile, Sir Henry (1649-1622) . . . . .	856
Saumarez, James, Lord de Saumarez (1757-1830) . . . . .	808	Savile, Henry (1642-1687) . . . . .	859
Saumarez, Philip (1716-1747) . . . . .	808	Savile, Jeremiah (fl. 1651) . . . . .	866
Saumarez, Richard (1764-1835) . . . . .	807	Savile, Sir John (1545-1607) . . . . .	880
Saumarez, Thomas (d. 1768). See under Saumarez, Philip.		Savile, John, first Baron Savile of Pontefract (1656-1686) . . . . .	881
Saumarez, Sir Thomas (1780-1845). See under Saumarez, James, Lord de Saumarez.		Savile, John, first Baron Savile of Rufford (1812-1896) . . . . .	882
Saunders, Sir Charles (1718?-1775) . . . . .	868	Savile, Thomas (d. 1593). See under Savile, Sir Henry.
Saunders, Sir Edmund (d. 1838) . . . . .	810	Savile, Thomas, first Viscount Savile of Castlebar in the peerage of Ireland, second Baron Savile of Pontefract and first Earl of Sussex in the peerage of England (1590?-1658?) . . . . .	888
Saunders, Sir Edward (d. 1576) . . . . .	811	Savile, William, second Marquis of Halifax (1885-1706). See under Savile, Sir George, Marquis of Halifax.
Saunders, Erasmus (1670-1724) . . . . .	812	Saviolo, Vicentino (fl. 1595) . . . . .	868
Saunders, Sir George (1871?-1784) . . . . .	812	Savona, Laurence William of (fl. 1485) . . . . .	868
Saunders, George (1762-1839) . . . . .	813	Savory, Sir William Soovel (1826-1895) . . . . .	867
Saunders, Henry (1728-1785) . . . . .	814	Savoy, Boniface of (d. 1276). See Boniface.
Saunders, John (1810-1895) . . . . .	814	Savoy, Peter of, Earl of Richmond (d. 1266). See Peter.
Saunders, John Cunningham (1778-1810) . . . . .	815	Sawbridge, John (1732?-1795) . . . . .	868
Saunders, Katherine (1841-1894). See under Saunders, John.		Sawrey, Solomon (1705-1826) . . . . .	869
Saunders, Laurence (d. 1555) . . . . .	816	Sawtre or Sawtre, James (fl. 1541) . . . . .	869
Saunders, Margaret (fl. 1762-1744) . . . . .	816	Sawtre, William (d. 1401) . . . . .	869

	PAGE		PAGE
Sawyer, Edmund ( d. 1759) . . . . .	870	Schevez or Schives, William ( d. 1497) . . . . .	905
Sawyer, Herbert (1781?-1798) . . . . .	870	Schiavonetti, Luigi (1788-1810) . . . . .	908
Sawyer, Sir Robert (1838-1892) . . . . .	870	Schiavonetti, Niccolò (1771-1818). See under
Saxby, Henry Linckmyer (1836-1873) . . . . .	873	Schiavonetti, Luigi . . . . .
Saxon, James ( d. 1817?) . . . . .	873	Schimmelpenninck, Mrs. Mary Anne (1778-1858) . . . . .	906
Saxony, Duchess of (1186-1189). See Matilda.		Schipton, John of ( d. 1257) See John . . . . .
Saxton, Sir Charles (1732-1808) . . . . .	873	Schmidt, Bernard (1802?-1708). See Smith.
Saxton, Christopher ( d. 1670-1696) . . . . .	874	Schmitz, Leonhard, LL.D. (1807-1890) . . . . .	907
Saxulf or Sexulfus ( d. 891?) . . . . .	874	Schnebbellie, Jacob (1780-1793) . . . . .	909
Say, Frederick Richard ( d. 1826-1858). See		Schnebbellie, Robert Bremmel ( d. 1849?). See under Say, William (1788-1854).		under Schnebbellie, Jacob . . . . .
Say, Geoffrey de, Baron de Say (1305?-1350) . . . . .	875	Scholefield, James (1789-1863) . . . . .	909
Say, Sir John ( d. 1478) . . . . .	876	Scholefield, Joshua (1744-1844). See under
Say, Samuel (1876-1743) . . . . .	877	Scholefield, William . . . . .
Say, William (1804-1886?) . . . . .	878	Scholefield, William (1809-1887) . . . . .	910
Say, William (1768-1884) . . . . .	878	Scholes, James Christopher (1832-1890) . . . . .	911
Saye and Sele, first Viscount. See Fiennes,		Schomburg, Sir Alexander (1730-1604) . . . . .	911
William (1682-1683).		Schomburg, Alexander Crowcher (1760-1792) . . . . .	912
Saye or Say and Sele, Lord. See Fiennes,		Schomburg, Alexander Wilmot (1774-1850) . . . . .
James ( d. 1450).		See under Schomburg, Sir Alexander.
Sayer, Augustin (1790-1881) . . . . .	879	Schomburg, Charles, second Duke of Schom-
Sayer or Sear, Robert, in religion Gregory		berg (1645-1693). See under Schomburg
(1580-1602) . . . . .	879	or Schönberg, Frederick Herman, Duke of
Sayers, Frank (1763-1817) . . . . .	880	Schomburg . . . . .
Sayers or Sayer, James (1748-1823) . . . . .	881	Schomburg, Sir Charles Marsh (1779-1835) . . . . .	912
Sayers, Tom (1826-1885) . . . . .	881	Schomburg or Schönberg, Frederick Herman,
Sayle, William ( d. 1671) . . . . .	882	Duke of Schomburg (1816-1890) . . . . .	912
Saywell, William (1843-1701) . . . . .	882	Schomburg, Isaac (1714-1780) . . . . .	921
Scalby, Scalley, Schalby, John de ( d. 1333) . . . . .	883	Schomburg, Isaac (1768-1818) . . . . .	922
Soales, Baron. See Woodville or Wydville,		Schomburg, Meinhard, Duke of Leinster and
Anthony, second Earl Rivers (1442?-1483).		third Duke of Schomburg (1641-1719) . . . . .	923
Soales, Thomas do, seventh Lord Soales		Schomburg, Mayer Löw, M.D. (1890-1761) . . . . .	925
(1899?-1460) . . . . .	884	Schomburg, Raphael or Ralph (1714-1792) . . . . .	925
Scambler, Edmund (1610?-1594) . . . . .	885	Schomburg, Richard (1811-1890). See under Scandrett, Scandret, or Scanderet, Stephen		Schomburg, Sir Robert Hermann . . . . .
(1881?-1708) . . . . .	885	Schomburg, Sir Robert Hermann (1804-1805) . . . . .	926
Scarborough, Earl of. See Lumley, Richard		Schonan, Anian de ( d. 1293) . . . . .	927
( d. 1721).		Schorlammer, Carl (1884-1893) . . . . .	928
Scarburgh, Sir Charles, M.D. (1616-1694) . . . . .	886	Schreiber, Lady Charlotte Elizabeth (1812-1895) . . . . .	929
Scardeburg, Robert de ( d. 1841) . . . . .	887	Schroeder, Henry (1774-1858) . . . . .	930
Scargill, William Pitt (1787-1886) . . . . .	887	Schulenburg, Countess Ehrangard Meluina
Scarfebrick, Edward (1689-1709). See Ne-		von der, Duchess of Kendal (1667-1743) . . . . .	930
ville, Edward.		Schwanfelder, Charles Henry (1778-1887) . . . . .	932
Scarle, John de ( d. 1408?) . . . . .	888	Schwartz or Swartz, Christian Friedrich
Scarlett, James, first Baron Abinger (1769-1844) . . . . .	888	(1726-1798) . . . . .	932
Scarlett, Sir James Yorke (1799-1871) . . . . .	891	Schwartz, Martin ( d. 1487) . . . . .	935
Scarlett, Nathaniel (1758-1802) . . . . .	892	Schweickhardt, Heinrich Wilhelm (1746-1797) . . . . .	935
Scarlett, Peter Campbell (1804-1881) . . . . .	892	Sclater, Edward (1693-1699?) . . . . .	935
Scarlett, Robert (1499?-1694) . . . . .	894	Sclater, William (1676-1626) . . . . .	936
Soarthe, Alice Mary Elizabeth (1848-1889). See under Soarthe, Harry Mengden.		Sclater, William ( d. 1648). See under Slatyer or Slater, William.
Soarthe, Harry Mengden (1814-1890) . . . . .	894	Sclater, William (1809-1861). See under Soatclard, Norrieseon Cavendish (1790-1858) . . . . .	895	Sclater, William (1676-1626) . . . . .
Soattersgood, Antony (1611-1687) . . . . .	895	Sclater, William ( d. 1717?) . . . . .	937
Soattersgood, Samuel (1846-1899). See under Scattergood, Antony.		Sclater-Booth, George, Lord Basing (1826-1894) . . . . .	938
Schalby, John de ( d. 1838). See Scalby.		Scobell, Henry ( d. 1860) . . . . .	938
Schaloh, Andrew (1692-1778) . . . . .	898	Scoffin, William (1855?-1782) . . . . .	939
Schanok, John (1740-1828) . . . . .	897	Scogan or Scoggin, Henry (1881?-1407) . . . . .	939
Scharf, George (1788-1860) . . . . .	898	Scogan, John ( d. 1480). See under Scogan or Scoggin, Henry.
Scharf, Sir George (1820-1896) . . . . .	899	Scoles, Joseph John (1798-1868) . . . . .	941
Scharpe, George ( d. 1683) . . . . .	900	Scoloker, Anthony ( d. 1548) . . . . .	942
Schanb, Sir Luke ( d. 1758) . . . . .	901	Scoloker, Anthony ( d. 1694). See under
Schaw, William (1650-1602) . . . . .	902	Scoloker, Anthony ( d. 1548) . . . . .
Schaw, William, M.D. (1714?-1757) . . . . .	903	Soorburgh, Sir Robert de ( d. 1840) . . . . .	943
Scheemakers, Peter (1891-1770) . . . . .	903	Scoreby, William (1780-1829) . . . . .	943
Scheemakers, Thomas (1740-1808). See under Scheemakers, Peter.		Scoreby, William (1789-1867) . . . . .	944
Schetky, John Alexander (1785-1824) . . . . .	903	Scoreby-Jackson, Robert Edmund (1886-1887). See Jackson
Schetky, John Christian (1778-1874) . . . . .	904
Schenker, John Gaspar, M.D. (1702-1729) . . . . .	905

	PAGE		PAGE
Seory, John ( d. 1585) . . . . .	946	Scott, Robert (1811-1887) . . . . .	1003
Seot. See also Scott.		Scott, Robert Bissot (1774-1811) . . . . .	1004
Seot, David (1776?-1834) . . . . .	947	Scott, Robert Edon (1770-1811) . . . . .	1004
Seot or Scott, Thomas ( f. 1805). See under		Scott, Samuel (1710?-1772) . . . . .	1001
Scott, Thomas (1585?-1826).		Scott, Samuel (1710-1788). See under Scott,
Scotland, Henry of (1114?-1152). See Henry.		John (1730-1783).
Scotstaveit, Sir John of (1585-1070). See		Scott, Sarah ( d. 1705) . . . . .	1005
Scott, Sir John.		Scott or Scott, Thomas (1423-1500). See
Scott. See also Scot.		Rotherham.
Scott, Alexander (1325?-1584) . . . . .	948	Scotter Scott, Thomas, Lord Petgormo (1480?-
Scott, Alexander John (1788-1848) . . . . .	948	1589) . . . . .	1005
Scott, Alexander John (1805-1806) . . . . .	950	Scott, Sir Thomas (1585-1584). See under
Scott, Andrew (1757-1859) . . . . .	951	Scott, Sir William ( d. 1350)
Scott, Benjamin (1788-1880). See under Scott,		Scott, Thomas (1580?-1620) . . . . .	1008
Thomas (1747-1821).		Scott or Scot, Thomas ( d. 1680) . . . . .	1008
Scott, Benjamin (1814-1882) . . . . .	952	Scott, Thomas (1705-1775) . . . . .	1010
Scott, Caroline Lucy, Lady Scott (1784-1857)	952	Scott, Thomas (1747-1821) . . . . .	1011
Scott or Scot, Cuthbert ( d. 1564) . . . . .	953	Scott, Thomas (1786-1885). See under Scott,
Scott, Daniel, LL.D. (1694-1759) . . . . .	953	Thomas (1747-1821).
Scott, David (1808-1849) . . . . .	954	Scots, Thomas (1745-1842) . . . . .	1018
Scott, Elizabeth (1708?-1778). See under		Scott, Thomas (1808-1878) . . . . .	1014
Scott, Thomas (1705-1775).		Scott, Sir Walter (1460?-1552) . . . . .	1014
Scott or Scot, George ( d. 1685) . . . . .	953	Scott, Walter, first Lord Scott of Buccleuch
Scott, Sir George Gilbert (1811-1878) . . . . .	957	(1565-1611) . . . . .	1015
Scott, George Lewis (1708-1786) . . . . .	961	Scott, Walter (1556?-1626?) . . . . .	1017
Scott or Scot, Gregory ( d. 1576) . . . . .	961	Scott, Walter, Earl of Tarras (1644-1693) . . . . .	1017
Scott, Harriot Anne, Lady Scott (1810-1834)	962	Scott, Walter, of Satchells (1614?-1694?) . . . . .	1018
Scott, Helenus, M.D. (1786-1821) . . . . .	962	Scott, Sir Walter (1771-1832) . . . . .	1018
Scott, Henry, Earl of Deloraine (1676-1786)	962	Scott, Walter Francis, fifth Duke of Buc-
Scott, Henry, third Duke of Buccleuch and		cleuch and seventh Duke of Queensberry fifth Duke of Queensberry (1746-1812) . . . . .	963	(1800-1884). See under Scott, Henry,
Scott, Henry Young Darracott (1822-1883) . . . . .	964	third Duke of Buccleuch and fifth Duke
Scott, How (1791-1872) . . . . .	965	of Queensberry.
Scott, Sir James ( f. 1579-1666) . . . . .	965	Scott, Sir William ( d. 1850) . . . . .	1048
Scott, James (known as Fitzroy and as Crofts),		Scott, Sir William (1450-1524). See under Duke of Monmouth and Buccleuch (1649-		Scott, Sir William ( d. 1566).
1695) . . . . .	966	Scott or Scot, Sir William, Lord Balwarrie
Scott, James, D.D. (1788-1814) . . . . .	975	( d. 1532) . . . . .	1045
Scott, Sir James (1766?-1872) . . . . .	975	Scott, Sir William ( d. 1656) . . . . .	1046
Scott, James Robert Hope-Scott. (1812-1878). See		Scott, Sir William (1674?-1726) . . . . .	1046
Hope-Scott.		Scott, William, Lord Stowall (1745-1810) . . . . .	1048
Scott, Sir James Sibbald David (1814-1885) . . . . .	970	Scott, William (1707-1818) . . . . .	1050
Scott, Sir John ( d. 1485). See under Scott,		Scott, William (1818-1872) . . . . .	1050
Sir William ( d. 1850).		Scott, William Bell (1811-1890) . . . . .	1051
Scott or Scot, John ( f. 1586) . . . . .	973	Scottow, Joshua (1618-1698) . . . . .	1058
Scott, Sir John (1484?-1538). See under		Scotus or Erigena, John ( f. 850) . . . . .	1058
Scott, Sir William ( d. 1850).		Scotus, Marianus (1628-1682?). See Ma-
Scott or Scot, John ( f. 1556) . . . . .	977	rianus.
Scott, Sir John (1570-1616). See under Scott,		Scotus, Macarius ( d. 1158). See Macarius.
Sir William ( d. 1850).		Scotus, Duns (1265?-1308?). See Duns,
Scott or Scot, Sir John (1585-1070) . . . . .	977	Joannes Scotus.
Scott, John (1889-1806) . . . . .	979	Scougal, Henry (1650-1678) . . . . .	1058
Scott, John ( f. 1654-1666) . . . . .	979	Scougal or Scougall, John (1645?-1780?) . . . . .	1059
Scott, John (1780-1788) . . . . .	980	Scougal or Scougall, Patrick (1687?-1682) . . . . .	1059
Scott, John, Earl of Clonmoll (1780-1788)	981	Scovler, John (1804-1871) . . . . .	1060
Scott, afterwards Scott-Waring, John (1747-		Scovell, Sir George (1774-1861) . . . . .	1061
1819) . . . . .	984	Scratchley, Sir Peter Henry (1835-1885) . . . . .	1001
Scott, John (1788-1821) . . . . .	985	Scriba, or The Scribe, Robert ( f. 1170).
Scott, John (1774-1827) . . . . .	988	See Robert of Bridlington.
Scott, John (1777-1884). See under Scott,		Scrimger, Henry (1500-1672). See Sorym-
Thomas (1747-1821).		geour.
Scott, John, first Earl of Eldon (1751-1838) . . . . .	987	Scrimgeour, Sir James (1550?-1612). See
Scott, John (1798-1846) . . . . .	984	Sorymgeour.
Scott, John (1794-1871) . . . . .	985	Scriven, Edward (1775-1841) . . . . .	1068
Scott, Jonathan, LL.D. (1751-1829) . . . . .	986	Scrivener, Frederick Henry Ambrose (1818-
Scott, Joseph Nicol, M.D. (1708?-1766) . . . . .	987	1891) . . . . .	1064
Scott or Scot, Michael (1175?-1284?) . . . . .	987	Scrivener, Matthew ( f. 1660) . . . . .	1064
Scott, Michael (1789-1835) . . . . .	1008	Scroggs, Sir William (1628?-1688) . . . . .	1005
Scott or Scot, Patrick ( f. 1680) . . . . .	1061	Scroggs, Sir William (1652?-1805). See
Scott or Scot, Reginald or Reynold (1589?-		under Scroggs, Sir William (1628?-1888).
1569) . . . . .	1061	Scroop, Laurence (1577-1648). See Ander-
Scott, Robert 1777-1841) . . . . .	1003	ton.

Index to Volume XVII.

140,

	PAGE		PAGE
Scrope or Scroope, Adrian (1601-1660).	1070	Seaton, Sir Thomas (1806-1876)	1105
Scrope or Scroope, Sir Adrian (fl. 1607). See under Scrope or Scroope, Adrian.		Seawald, John (1786-1875)	1106
Scrope or Scroop, Sir Carr (1619-1660)	1071	Seaward, Samuel (1800-1812). See under Seaward, John.
Scrope, Sir Geoffrey le (fl. 1840)	1072	Sebbi, Saebbi, or Sebba (fl. 693?)	1107
Scrope, George Julius Poulett (1797-1876)	1073	Sebert. See also Siegbert.
Scrope, Sir Henry le (fl. 1826)	1075	Sebert, Saberet, or Sabi (fl. 816?)	1107
Scrope, Henry le, first Baron Scrope of Masham (1815-1801)	1076	Selbright, Sir John Saunders (1767-1946)	1109
Scrope, Henry le, third Baron Scrope of Masham (1376?-1415)	1077	Sacker, Thomas (1603-1709)	1109
Scrope, Henry le, ninth Baron Scrope of Bolton (1384-1592)	1078	Sacker, William (fl. 1631?)	1111
Scrope, John le, fifth Baron Scrope of Bolton (1483-1499)	1079	Seckford or Sackford, Thomas (1515?-1517)	1111
Scrope, John (1602?-1752)	1079	Securis, John (fl. 1566)	1112
Scrope, Richard le, first Baron Scrope of Bolton (1327?-1403)	1080	Securis or Hatchett, Michael (fl. 1515). See under Securis, John.
Scrope, Richard le (1850?-1405)	1082	Sedding, Edmund (1806-1868)	1113
Scrope, Thomas (fl. 1401), also called Bradley	1085	Sedding, John Dando (1833-1891)	1113
Scrope, William le, Earl of Wiltshire (1351?-1399)	1086	Seddon, Felix John Vaughan (1710-1813)	1114
Scrope, William (1772-1852)	1088	Seddon, John (1814-1790)	1114
Scrymgeour or Scrumger, Henry (1506-1579)	1088	Seddon, John (1719-1769)	1114
Scrymgeour, Sir James (1530?-1612)	1089	Seddon, John (1725-1770)	1115
Scrymgeour, James, second Viscount Dundhope (d. 1641). See under Scrymgeour, Sir James.		Seddon, Thomas (1713-1796)	1116
Scrymgeour, John, Viscount Dundhope (d. 1648). See under Scrymgeour, Sir James.		Seddon, Thomas (1821-1856)	1116
Scrymgeour, John, third Viscount Dundhope and first Earl of Dundee (d. 1668). See under Scrymgeour, Sir James.		Sedgwick, Adam (1786-1873)	1117
Scudamore, Sir Charles, M.D. (1779-1849)	1090	Sedgwick, Daniel (1814-1870)	1120
Scudamore, Frank Ives (1823-1864)	1091	Sedgwick, James (1775-1551)	1120
Scudamore, John, first Viscount Scudamore (1801-1871)	1092	Sedgwick, John (1601?-1649). See under Sedgwick, Obadiah.
Soudamore, William Edward (1813-1881)	1095	Sedgwick, Obadiah (1600?-1668)	1121
Soudder, Henry (d. 1659?)	1096	Sedgwick, Thomas, D.D. (fl. 1550-1565)	1122
Souly, Denys (1778-1800)	1097	Sedgwick, William (1810?-1669?)	1120
Souly, Vincent (1810-1871). See under Souly, Denys.		Sedley, Catharine, Countess of Dorchester (1657-1717)	1122
Seafeld, Earls of. See Ogilvy, James, first Earl, 1664-1780; Ogilvy, James, third Earl, 1714?-1770.		Sedley, Sir Charles (1699?-1701)	1123
Seaford, Barons. See Ellis, Charles Rose, first Baron, 1771-1845; Ellis, Charles Augustus, second Baron, 1799-1868.		Sedulus (d. 828)	1123
Seaforth, Earls of. See Mackenzie, Kenneth, fourth Earl, d. 1701; Mackenzie, William, fifth Earl, d. 1740.		Seeborn, Henry (1682-1695)	1127
Seaforth and Mackenzie, Lord. See Humberston, Francis Mackenzie (1754-1815).		Seed, Jeremiah (1700-1747)	1127
Seagar, John (d. 1666). See under Segar or Seager, Francis.		Sealey, Sir John Robert (1584-1595)	1128
Seager, Charles (1806-1878)	1097	Seeley, Leonard Benton (1691-1893). See under Seeley, Robert Benton.
Seager, Edward (1812-1883)	1098	Seeley, Robert Benton (1708-1880)	1131
Seager, Francis (fl. 1549-1663). See Segar.		Seeman or Zeeman, Enoch (1691-1744)	1132
Seagrave, Robert (1698-1760?)	1099	Seemann, Berthold Carl (1825-1871)	1132
Seally, John (1747?-1795)	1099	Seffrid, Seffrid, Seunfrid, or Seifred II (d. 1204)	1138
Seaman, Lazarus (d. 1876)	1100	Segar or Seager, Francis (fl. 1549-1568)	1134
Seaman, William (1600-1640)	1101	Segar, Simon (fl. 1650-1713). See under Segar, Sir William.
Seamus Dall (fl. 1712). See Macquair, James.		Segar, Sir William (d. 1683)	1135
Searchfield, Rowland (1655?-1822)	1102	Segrave, Gilbert de (d. 1254)	1136
Searle, Thomas (1777-1849)	1102	Segrave, Gilbert de (d. 1818?)	1137
Seaton. See also Seton.		Segrave, Gilbert de (d. 1316)	1137
Seaton, Baron. See Colborne, Sir John (1778-1868).		Segrave, Sir Hugh (d. 1365?)	1137
Seaton, Edward Cator (1815-1880)	1103	Segrave, John de (1256?-1825)	1138
Seaton, John Thomas (fl. 1761-1806)	1104	Segrave, Nicholas de, first Baron Segrave (1288?-1295)	1140
Seaton, Thomas (1684-1741)	1104	Segrave, Nicholas de, Lord of Stows (d. 1322)	1142
		Segrave or Sedgrave, Stephen de (d. 1341)	1143
		Segrave, Stephen de (d. 1833)	1144
		Segurde, John (fl. 1414)	1145
		Seguier, John (1765-1836). See under Seguier, William.
		Seguis, William (1771-1843)	1145
		Seguin, Ann Childe (1814-1888). See under Seguin, Arthur Edward Shelden.
		Seguin, Arthur Edward Shelden (1800-1852)	1146
		Seirial (fl. 680)	1147
		Selborne, Earl of. See Palmer, Roundell (1812-1895).
		Selby, Charles (1802?-1868)	1147
		Selby, Frideaur John (1788-1887)	1148
		Selby, Walford Dakin (1845-1899)	1149

	PAGE		PAGE
Selden, John (1584-1654) . . . . .	1150	Serres, Dominio (1722-1798) . . . . .	1191
Selkirk, fifth Earl of. See Douglas, Thomas (1771-1820).		Serree, John Thomas (1750-1825) . . . . .	1194
Selkirk, Alexander (1876-1921) . . . . .	1162	Serres, Lavinia Janetta Horton de (1797-1871). See under Serres, Mrs. Olivia.
Sellar, Alexander Craig (1835-1890). See under Sellar, Patrick.		Serres, Mrs. Olivia (1772-1834) . . . . .	1195
Sellar, Patrick (1780-1851) . . . . .	1103	Servico, John, D.D. (1838-1884) . . . . .	1197
Sellar, William Young (1825-1890) . . . . .	1181	Setchell, Sarah (1808-1894) . . . . .	1197
Seller, Abednego (1646?-1705) . . . . .	1164	Seton, Sir Alexander (fl. 1311-1840) . . . . .	1198
Seller, John (fl. 1700) . . . . .	1105	Seton, Sir Alexander, first Earl of Huntly (d. 1470) . . . . .	1198
Sellon, Baker John (1782-1885) . . . . .	1166	Seton, Alexander (d. 1542) . . . . .	1199
Sellon, Priscilla Lydia (1821-1876) . . . . .	1166	Seton, Sir Alexander, first Earl of Dunfermline (1655?-1692) . . . . .	1199
Sellyng, Richard (fl. 1450) . . . . .	1107	Seton, Alexander, sixth Earl of Eglinton (1589-1881). See Montgomerie.
Selred or Selred (d. 746) . . . . .	1107	Seton, Alexander, Viscount Kingston (1021?-1091) . . . . .	1202
Selvaeh (d. 729) . . . . .	1107	Seton, Sir Alexander, Lord Pitmedden (1580?-1719) . . . . .	1202
Selwyn, Sir Charles Jasper (1818-1869) . . . . .	1108	Seton, Alexander (1814-1852) . . . . .	1208
Selwyn, George Augustus (1719-1791) . . . . .	1109	Seton, Charles, second Earl of Dunfermline (d. 1878) . . . . .	1208
Selwyn, George Augustus (1809-1878) . . . . .	1170	Seton, Sir Christopher (1278?-1800) . . . . .	1204
Selwyn, William (1775-1855) . . . . .	1171	Seton, George, first Lord Seton (d. 1478) . . . . .	1205
Selwyn, William (1806-1875) . . . . .	1171	Seton, George, fourth Lord Seton (d. 1549) . . . . .	1205
Sempill. See also Sample.		Seton, George, fifth Lord Seton (1580?-1585) . . . . .	1208
Sempill, Francis (1816?-1682) . . . . .	1172	Seton, George, third Earl of Winton (1584-1850) . . . . .	1208
Sempill, Hew, eleventh Lord Sempill (d. 1740) . . . . .	1178	Seton, George, fifth Earl of Winton (d. 1740) . . . . .	1208
Sempill or Semple, Hugh, Hugo Sempilius (1590-1654) . . . . .	1178	Seton, John, D.D. (1498?-1567) . . . . .	1209
Sempill, Sir James (1586-1625) . . . . .	1178	Seton, Sir John, Lord Barus (d. 1594) . . . . .	1210
Sempill or Semple, Robert, third Lord Sempill (d. 1572) . . . . .	1175	Seton or Setons, Thomas de (fl. 1844-1861) . . . . .	1210
Sempill, Robert (1580?-1595) . . . . .	1176	Seton, Sir William (d. 1741) See under Seton, Sir Alexander, Lord Pitmedden.
Sempill, Robert (1595?-1605?). See under Sempill, Sir James.		Settle, Elkanah (1648-1724) . . . . .	1210
Sempill or Semple, William (1546-1683) . . . . .	1177	Settle, Thomas (fl. 1575-1598) . . . . .	1218
Semple. See also Sempill.		Sevenoke, Sir William (1878?-1493?) . . . . .	1214
Semple, David (1808-1878) . . . . .	1178	Saver, Henry (d. 1471) . . . . .	1314
Semple, George (1700?-1782?) . . . . .	1178	Saver, William (d. 1506). See Senhouse.
Semple alias Semple-Lisle, James George (fl. 1790) . . . . .	1179	Sovern, Ann Mary (1882-1886). See Nowton.
Semple, Robert (1786-1816) . . . . .	1179	Sovern, Joseph (1793-1879) . . . . .	1215
Sempringham, Gilbert of (1088?-1139). See Gilbert.		Sowall do Bovill (d. 1257) . . . . .	1217
Semur, John (fl. 1880). See Somer.		Sewall, Samuel (1052-1780) . . . . .	1217
Senan (488?-544?) . . . . .	1180	Seward, Anna (1747-1800) . . . . .	1218
Senatus, called Bravonius (d. 1307) . . . . .	1181	Seward, Thomas (1708-1790) . . . . .	1220
Senchan (fl. 610) . . . . .	1181	Seward, William (1747-1799) . . . . .	1220
Senex, John (d. 1740) . . . . .	1182	Seward, William Wenman (fl. 1800) . . . . .	1221
Sengham, William (fl. 1260) . . . . .	1182	Sewel, William (1654-1720) . . . . .	1221
Senhouse, Sir Humphrey Fleming (1781-1841) . . . . .	1182	Sewell, Anna (1820-1878). See under Sewell, Mary.
Senhouse, Richard (d. 1620) . . . . .	1183	Sewell, George (d. 1726) . . . . .	1228
Senhouse or Sever, William (d. 1505) . . . . .	1183	Sewell, Henry (1807-1870) . . . . .	1224
Senior, Nassau William (1790-1801) . . . . .	1183	Sewell, Jonathan (1760-1830) . . . . .	1224
Senlis or St. Liz, Simon de, Earl of Northampton and Huntingdon (d. 1109) . . . . .	1186	Sewell, Mary (1797-1864) . . . . .	1225
Senlis, Simon II de, Earl of Northampton (d. 1183). See under Senlis or St. Liz, Simon de, Earl of Northampton and Huntingdon.		Sewell, Richard Clarke (1808-1801) . . . . .	1226
Seppings, Sir Robert (1767-1840) . . . . .	1187	Sewell, Sir Thomas (d. 1781) . . . . .	1226
Seres, William (d. 1570?) . . . . .	1180	Sewell, William (1804-1874) . . . . .	1228
Sergeant. See also Sargent.		Sexburga, Sexburg, or Sexburh (d. 678) . . . . .	1229
Sergeant, John (1622-1707) . . . . .	1189	Sexburga, Saint (d. 699?) . . . . .	1229
Sergison, Charles (1054-1732) . . . . .	1192	Sezby, Edward (d. 1658) . . . . .	1230
Serie, Ambrose (1742-1812) . . . . .	1192	Sexted or Sexmød (d. 630) . . . . .	1231
Serlo (fl. 980?). See under Serlo, called Grammaticus.		Sexton, Richard (d. 1508). See Argentine, Richard.
Serlo of Bayeux (1086?-1104). See under Serlo, called Grammaticus.		Seyer, Samuel (1757-1831) . . . . .	1232
Serlo, called the Priest (d. 1147). See under Serlo, called Grammaticus.		Seyffarth, Mrs. Louisa (1798-1848) . . . . .	1232
Serlo, called Grammaticus (1109-1207?) . . . . .	1192	Sharpe.
Sermon, William (1029?-1079) . . . . .	1193	Seymour, Mrs. (fl. 1717-1728) . . . . .	1232
		Seymour, Aaron Crossley Hobart (1780-1870) . . . . .	1238
		Seymour, Algernon, seventh Duke (1884-1750). See under Seymour, Charles, sixth Duke of Somerset.

Index to Volume XVII.

1411

	PAGE		PAGE
Seymour, Lady Catherine, Countess of Hertford (1588?-1598)	1284	Shakerley, Jeremy ( f. 1650)	1293
Seymour, Charles, sixth Duke of Somerset (1602-1748)	1285	Shakespeare, John (1774-1859)	1293
Seymour, Edward, first Earl of Hertford and Duke of Somerset (1508?-1552)	1287	Shakespeare, Sir Richmond Campbell (1812-1881)	1284
Seymour, Edward, Lord Beauchamp (1581-1612). See under Seymour, Sir Edward, Earl of Hertford.		Shakespeare, William (1584-1616)	1286
Seymour, Sir Edward, Earl of Hertford (1589?-1821)	1248	Biography . . . . . 1286
Seymour, Sir Edward (1665-1708)	1250	Portraits and Memorials . . . . . 1293
Seymour, Edward Adolphus, eleventh Duke of Somerset (1776-1856)	1253	Bibliography . . . . . 1286
Seymour, Edward Adolphus Seymour, twelfth Duke of Somerset (1804-1885)	1253	Shakespeare's Reputation . . . . . 1293
Seymour, Edward James (1798-1866)	1254	Shalders, George (1825?-1878)	1385
Seymour, Francis, first Baron Seymour of Trowbridge (1590?-1884)	1255	Shank, John (1740-1828). See Schanck.
Seymour, Francis (Ingram), second Marquis of Hertford (1743-1822)	1256	Shanks, John ( d. 1636)	1896
Seymour, Sir Francis (1818-1890)	1257	Shannon, Earl of. See Boyle, Henry (1692-1764).
Seymour, Frederick Beauchamp Paget, Lord Alcester (1821-1895)	1258	Shardelowe or Scherdelow, Sir John de ( d. 1344?)	1836
Seymour, Sir George Francis (1787-1870)	1259	Shareshull, William de ( f. 1860)	1887
Seymour, George Hamilton (1797-1886)	1260	Sharington or Sherington, Sir William (1495?-1553)	1887
Seymour, Henry (1612-1666)	1260	Shurman-Crawford, William (1781-1861). See Crawford.
Seymour, Henry (1739-1805)	1261	Sharp. See also Sharpe.
Seymour, Lord Henry (1805-1859)	1261	Sharp, Abraham (1651-1742)	1834
Seymour, Lord Hugh (1759-1861)	1261	Sharp, Sir Cuthbert (1781-1840)	1839
Seymour, James (1762-1762)	1262	Sharp, Granville (1735-1813)	1839
Seymour, Jane (1500?-1537). See Jane.		Sharp, Jack ( d. 1481)	1342
Seymour, Sir Michael (1768-1884)	1262	Sharp, James (1618-1670)	1942
Seymour, Sir Michael (1802-1887)	1264	Sharp, John (1872?-1646?)	1845
Seymour, Michael Hobart (1800-1874)	1265	Sharp, John (1615-1714)	1846
Seymour, Robert. See Mottley, John (1692-1750).		Sharp or Sharpe, Leonel (1559-1631)	1349
Seymour, Robert (1800?-1886)	1266	Sharp, Michael William ( d. 1840)	1350
Seymour, Thomas, Baron Seymour of Sudley (1508?-1849)	1268	Sharp, Patrick ( d. 1615)	1350
Seymour, William, first Marquis and second Earl of Hertford and second Duke of Somerset (1588-1660)	1271	Sharp, Richard (1759-1835)	1351
Seymour, William Digby (1833-1895)	1278	Sharp, Samuel (1700?-1778)	1352
Seymour-Conway, Francis first Marquis of Hertford (1716-1794). See Conway.		Sharp, Samuel (1814-1882)	1353
Seymour-Conway, Francis Charles, third Marquis of Hertford (1777-1842). See under Seymour, Francis (Ingram), second Marquis of Hertford.		Sharp, Thomas, D.D. (1693-1758)	1354
Shaa. See Shaw.		Sharp, Thomas (1770-1841)	1354
Shackleton, Abraham (1697-1771)	1274	Sharp, William (1749-1824)	1355
Shackleton, John ( d. 1707)	1275	Sharp, William (1805-1836)	1356
Shackleton, Richard (1728-1792). See under Shackleton, Abraham.		Sharpe. See also Sharp.
Shadlock, Richard ( f. 1676)	1276	Sharpe, Bartholomew ( f. 1679-1682)	1857
Shadmech, Azariah (1774-1844)	1276	Sharpe, Charles Kirkpatrick (1781?-1831)	1858
Shadwell, Charles ( f. 1710-1720). See under Shadwell, Thomas.		Sharpe, Charlotte ( d. 1849). See under Sharpe, Louisa, afterwards Mrs. Seyfarth.
Shadwell, Sir Charles Frederik Alexander (1814-1888)	1276	Sharpe, Daniel (1808-1868)	1359
Shadwell, Sir John (1871-1747)	1276	Sharpe, Edmund (1809-1877)	1360
Shadwell, Sir Lancelot (1779-1850)	1277	Sharpe, Eliza (1796-1874). See under Sharpe, Louisa, afterwards Mrs. Seyfarth.
Shadwell, Lawrence (1823-1897). See under Shadwell, Sir Lancelot.		Sharpe, Gregory (1718-1771)	1861
Shadwell, Thomas (1642?-1692)	1278	Sharpe, James (1577?-1630)	1362
Shaftesbury, Earls of. See Cooper, Anthony Ashley, first Earl, 1621-1839; Cooper, Anthony Ashley, third Earl, 1871-1713; Cooper, Anthony Ashley, seventh Earl, 1801-1865.		Sharpe, Lewis ( f. 1610)	1362
Shairp, John Campbell (1819-1885)	1281	Sharpe, Louisa, afterwards Mrs. Seyfarth (1788-1848)	1362
		Sharpe, Mary Anne ( d. 1867). See under Sharpe, Louisa, afterwards Mrs. Seyfarth.
		Sharpe, Roger ( f. 1010). See under Sharpe, Lewis.
		Sharpe, Samuel (1799-1861)	1363
		Sharpeigh, Alexander ( f. 1007-1618)	1365
		Sharpey, William (1502-1880)	1365
		Sharpham, Edward (1576-1608)	1367
		Sharples or Sharpless, James (1750?-1811)	1367
		Sharples, James (1825-1893)	1368
		Sharples, Rolinda ( d. 1839). See under Sharples or Sharpless, James.
		Shazrock, Robert (1830-1884)	1368
		Shaw, Alexander (1804-1806)	1369
		Shaw, Sir Charles (1795-1871)	1370
		Shaw, Cuthbert (1780-1771)	1371
		Shaw, Duncan (1735-1795)	1372
		Shaw or Shaa, Sir Edmund ( d. 1487?)	1373
		Shaw, Sir Frederick (1798-1878)	1373

	PAGE		PAGE
Shaw, George (1751-1813) . . .	1874	Shaw, Stebbing (1702-1802) . . .	1888
Shaw, Henry (1800-1878) . . .	1374	Shaw, Thomas (1604-1751) . . .	1894
Shaw, Sir James (1704-1848) . . .	1375	Shaw, Thomas Budge (1813-1862) . . .	1883
Shaw, John (1659-1625) . . .	1876	Shaw, William (1550-1603). See Schaw
Shaw or Shawe, John (1608-1672) . . .	1376	Shaw, William (1740-1831) . . .	1388
Shaw, John (1614-1689) . . .	1378	Shaw, William (1707-1853) . . .	1386
Shaw, John (1792-1827) . . .	1878	Shaw, William (1823-1895) . . .	1387
Shaw, John (1776-1892) . . .	1878	Shaw-Kennedy, Sir James (1789-1865). See Kennedy.
Shaw, John (1808-1870). See under Shaw,		Shaw-Lefevre, Charles, Viscount Eversley
John (1776-1892).		(1794-1888) . . .	1888
Shaw, Joseph (1871-1798) . . .	1879	Shaw-Lefevre, Sir John George (1797-1879) . . .	1399
Shaw, Lauchlan (1692-1777) . . .	1379	Shawe. See Shaw.
Shaw, Mary (1814-1876) . . .	1379	Shaxton, Nicholas (1485?-1550) . . .	1390
Shaw, Patrick (1796-1872) . . .	1380	Shca, David . . .	1892
Shaw, Peter (1694-1768) . . .	1380	Sheafte, Sir Roger Hale (1701-1851) . . .	1893
Shaw, Ralph or John ( il. 1481). See under		Shenies, Henry (1753-1798). See under
Shaw or Shan, Sir Edmund.		Shames, John.
Shaw, Robert Berkley (1880-1879) . . .	1391	Sheares, John (1766-1798) . . .	1398
Shaw, Samuel (1695-1696) . . .	1382

END OF THE SEVENTEENTH VOLUME.

